Confidence in Clinton Is Slipping Among Many Business Leaders

His Handling of Economic Policy Is a Sore Point

By SYLVIA NASAR

From his economic summit meeting in December to his budget speech to Congress in mid-February, President Clinton wooed, and seemed to have won over, many of America's top executives, most of whom are lifelong Republicans. The corporate world was charmed by the President's sincerity and intelligence, disarmed by his plans to tackle the deficit and promote economic growth and more than ready to give him a chance.

Three months later, the chorus of executive complaints is growing in volume, as expectations about the economy have deteriorated. And many business leaders, including some who are Democrats and others who supported Mr. Clinton during the election campaign, now say bluntly that the President's handling of economic policy has left them disillusioned and uneasy.

"This was the fastest honeymoon since Ernest Borgnine married Ethel Merman," said Jerry Della Femina, a Republican advertising executive who supported Mr. Clinton, recalling a Hollywood romance that lasted 12 days. "It's over."

'High Degree of Anxiety'

Stanley C. Gault, chairman and chief executive of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company and an influential business leader, commented: "I don't think there's any doubt today that the business community is very frustrated. They are disappointed. There's a high degree of anxiety and uncertainty."

And Irving S. Shapiro, a prominent Democrat who is a former chairman of E.I. du Pont de Nemours & Company, observed, "Bill Clinton has a repair job to do."

In telephone interviews last week, more than a dozen business leaders said that the President's tax proposals were anti-growth and that the Administration's approach to health care re-

U.S. AND ITS ALLIES STILL SEEM DIVIDED ON BOSNIA ACTION

ISSUE IS HOW LONG TO WAIT

Dispute on Serbs' Referendum Buys Time for Europeans, and for Clinton as Well

By THOMAS L. FRIEDMAN
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 8 — A day after President Clinton said he expected to produce "a common approach" with Europe soon on stronger action in Bosnia, Washington and its allies were increasingly at odds today over precisely what the next steps should be.

The Clinton Administration, officials said, would like to move ahead quickly with some form of military action that could pressure the Bosnian Serbs to accept the peace settlement. But Secretary of State Warren Christopher reported to President Clinton today that the Europeans — particularly Russia — wanted to wait and see if a Bosnian Serb referendum scheduled for May 15 and 16 resulted in a vote in favor of the settlement. This might spare the Europeans — and the United States — from having to take any military action.

Even if agreement were imminent with the allies, each of which has a slightly different approach to the situation, the United States would be in no position to take military action at once. Mr. Clinton has not yet won the approval of Congress or of the United Nations for such an operation, and he has just begun to prepare the American public for the possibility.

No Military Steps Ordered

Already faced with sagging popularity ratings, he is reluctant to take any step in the Balkans except as part of a unified front. Moreover, there are wide splits not only on Capitol Hill but also within his Administration about the wisest course of action.

In Bosnia, Muslim and Serbian officers reached a cease-fire accord providing for peacekeepers to move into the besieged Muslim enclave of Zepa, the senior United Nations commander in the country announced. [Page 10.]

Mr. Christopher, who returned Friday night from a six-day trip to Europe, where he tried to marshal support for military action among the reluctant allies, briefed the President at the White House this morning in a meeting of Mr. Clinton's top national security advisers.

But after hearing Mr. Christopher's report, Mr. Clinton chose not to order any military steps on Bosnia, and instead left the White House to spend the rest of the sunny Washington afternoon playing golf. The White House was not in the grip of war planning and there have been no special deployments of American aircraft or military personnel in preparation for action in Bosnia.

Clinton Administration officials, who put little stock in the Bosnian Serb referendum, said with contempt after today's White House meeting that the Europeans were looking for any way to

Americans on Health Care

From Iowa City and Cedar Rapids to Moline, Ill., across the Mississippi, Americans express deep anxieties about a capricious and fragmented network of doctors, companies and institutions that can impoverish even those it serves best. At the same time, many worry that a Government solution may deprive them of something they value, the freedom to choose their own doctors.

Even among the majority of Americans who say they are happy with their health coverage, it is hard to find anyone who questions why President Clinton seeks to change the health-care system.

They know they could lose a job or get very sick and land in the same boat as Maria Weirather, who has a part-time job that provides no health benefits and who had to sell her car to pay a hospital bill, or Elma Patten, caught in a twilight zone between a benefit-providing job she had to quit because of flagging health, and future eligibility for Medicare.

As Mr. Clinton's advisers put together their proposal, they know that whether it passes or sinks may depend on the responses of people like Ms. Weirather and Ms. Patten and those of people like William and Gertrude Coen, Debra O'Connor and Clifford McLaughlin.

The Coens, retirees in their 70's, could do without the tricks that their hearts, her eyes and now his liver play. But with Medicare and other insurance, one worry they do not have is the cost of doctors and hospitals.

Mr. McLaughlin, a press operator at Deere & Company, has a gold-plated union plan and has been paying practically nothing to help his 8-year-old daughter fight to keep her eyesight. Although Ms. O'Connor, a single mother, is on sure footing now, paying just $7 a month to insure herself and her three boys, she knows how tenuous that security is. She had to take a 30 percent pay cut to get a job that offered health benefits.

Peter T. Kilborn describes the current health arrangements of five families, what they hope to keep and what they hope will change.

Clinton Reverses Policies at U.N. On Rights Issues

By STEVEN A. HOLMES
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 8 — Taking a more aggressive stance on international human rights issues than its Republican predecessors, the Clinton Administration is pressing for appointment of a High Commissioner for Human Rights at the United Nations, as well as a special envoy to investigate abuses against women.

The initiatives were part of a nine-page proposal presented this week to a human rights meeting in Geneva by J. Kenneth Blackwell, the head of the United States delegation.

"This is the new Administration's action plan," Mr. Blackwell said after presenting the plan in Geneva. "It builds on what the new Administration perceives as American traditions, values, and standards in regards to human rights and it also offers new ideas and a new assertiveness in other areas."

Rights Conference Planned

The Geneva meeting was held to plan a major United Nations conference on Human Rights scheduled for June in Vienna. By the end of the meeting today it became clear that the Vienna conference would evolve into a showdown between Western nations seeking tougher human rights standards and developing nations, led by China, Iran and Pakistan, which oppose any new monitors of rights abuses.

Both Ronald Reagan and George Bush opposed the idea of a High Commissioner for Human Rights, who would coordinate the United Nations'

Washington Is Star-Struck As Hollywood Gets Serious

By MAUREEN DOWD
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 8 — It's hard to pinpoint the exact moment when things began spinning out of control on the celebrity front.

Was it when Michael Douglas eclipsed President Clinton at last weekend's White House Correspondents' Association dinner?

Was it when George Stephanopoulos, the White House communications director, began dating Jennifer Grey, the actress who starred in the 1987 movie "Dirty Dancing?"

Maybe it was simply when Barbra Streisand became as familiar a figure on the political scene as John McLaughlin, the carnivorous talk-show host.

A Rush From the Coast

The Clinton White House is extravagantly star-struck, and Hollywood's liberal luminaries, sensing an opportunity to be taken seriously and savoring the compatible politics, are flocking to Washington. Hollywood moguls and stars are pushing to move beyond their traditional roles as campaign ornaments and cash machines and become more substantive players as communications, image and policy advisers, and as salesmen for Clinton Administration programs.

Cabinet members and White House officials are giving the Hollywood big shots policy briefings and asking their help in selling programs on health care, the environment and national service.

"The idea that these insulated and bubble-headed people should help make policy is ridiculous," said Leon Wieseltier, the cultural editor of The New Republic magazine. "Hollywood actors are even more out of touch than elected politicians. In Hollywood, politics is another way of dressing and talking."

But Mr. Wieseltier appreciates the similar qualities that link the worlds of Germany Pays to Keep Ethnic Germans in Russia

Otto Pohl for The New York Times

When Erna Miller returned to Russia from exile, she hoped for the reestablishment of the Volga Republic. Now she hopes to go to Germany.

By STEVEN ERLANGER
Special to The New York Times

BEZYMYANNOYE, Russia — Katerina A. Zarya is one of several thousand ethnic Germans who have returned from Central Asian exile to the land their forebears settled more than 200 years ago, near the Volga River in central Russia.

Though fluent in Russian, Mrs. Zarya can still speak Schwäbisch, a southern German dialect learned from her parents and preserved in her heart like ancestral linen. And she intends to remake her life here, where her parents were born.

Under an agreement signed last July with Russia, the German Government is financing a magnet settlement here to discourage ethnic Germans from leaving the former Soviet Union. But many thousands of ethnic Germans, including most of Mrs. Zarya's relatives, prefer to exercise their legal right to emigrate to Germany.

Recruited By Catherine

The Volga Germans first came to Russia at the invitation of Catherine the Great, herself a German, who recruited them to teach Russians advanced methods of farming and other work in the late 18th century. But when the Nazis invaded the Soviet Union in 1941, Stalin disbanded the autonomous Volga German Republic and deported its citizens as potential fifth columnists, scattering them over Siberia and Central Asia.

A thin woman with mousy hair and many gold teeth, Mrs. Zarya is 38 but appears 15 years older.

"My parents left with small bags," she said. "All their lives they dreamed of coming back. Grandmother was 90 when she died in Kazakhstan, dreaming of this place, and my parents died there, too, dreaming."

Her parents spoke nothing but German, and she grew up in a little southern Kazakh village named Gagarin, where local children chased her down the street shouting, "Fascist! Fascist!" Even as an adult, as the Soviet

Traffic Deaths in New York Say a Lot About New Yorkers

By MATTHEW L. WALD

Around the nation one person is killed in an urban traffic accident for every 67 million miles driven. In New York City it is one death for every 29 million miles.

Nationally the victim is six times more likely to be a driver or a passenger than to be a pedestrian. In New York pedestrians make up half the fatalities. Among them were three children killed in the last several weeks in accidents involving drivers whose licenses had been suspended many times.

What is wrong with New York? The city's layout and density do not help, but one of the biggest problems may be that it is filled with New Yorkers.

"There's a lot of challenging going on out there, cars challenging pedestrians and pedestrians challenging cars," said Joel Friedman, head of the city transportation department's safety division. "Unfortunately, the cars usually win."

In New York, Drivers Take Aim

In other cities, Mr. Friedman said, pedestrians recognize the curb as a boundary line. Although drivers elsewhere may become angry if a person steps over the boundary, he said, they give way. "Here, when you step off the curb, they start aiming at you," he said.

Although traffic deaths have declined in the last few years, the recent accidents that killed the three children have raised troubling questions about whether more can be done to protect pedestrians. And they have focused attention on the way the police and courts handle cases involving bad drivers and on what many critics say is the city's laxityin dealing with traffic violations in general.

New York City Department of Transportation

In virtually every other city, for instance, running a red light is a criminal violation. In New York it is a civil violation, meaning that if the violator ignores the ticket, no arrest warrant will follow. (Jaywalking, however, is Paraguayans lining up yesterday at the election board in Asunción to find out where they are to vote in today's presidential election.

First Free Elections to Be Held Today in Paraguay

By JAMES BROOKE
Special to The New York Times

ASUNCIÓN, Paraguay, May 8 — For the first time since Paraguay won independence from Spain in 1811, no one here knows who will win the presidential election.

Breaking a long tradition of military coups and rigged civilian elections, Paraguayans are to vote on Sunday in the first free presidential elections in their history. With three centrist candidates in a dead heat, the winner is to be chosen by the voters, a new concept in this landlocked nation in the heart of South America.

In another novelty here, all six presidential candidates are civilians after nearly four decades of rule by army generals.

If fraud does not taint the process, Sunday's vote could also break a monopoly of nearly half a century by the ruling Colorado Party, which was born in 1947. The Colorado's unbroken tenure is surpassed in the Americas only by Mexico's Institutional Revolutionary Party.

But, worried that fraud could affect South America's last conversion to democratic civilian rule, 300 international observers from eight different groups have come here to watch Sunday's voting.

Carter Leads Delegation

Today, former President Jimmy Carter arrived, leading a delegation from the National Democratic Institute for International Affairs, a Washington group affiliated with the Democratic party that works to promote democracy.

"This is the first of four democratic elections this year in the hemisphere, and we want this one to work," one American Embassy official said here.

Elections are scheduled in Bolivia next month and in Chile and Venezuela in December. "Just like Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union, Paraguay has never known democracy since it became independent in 1811," the official said.

On the economic front, the candidates share virtually identical, free-market platforms, calling for privatization of state companies and for more foreign investment.

Juan Carlos Wasmosy, the ruling party candidate, is Paraguay's leading cotton exporter. Guillermo Caballero Vargas, the main challenger, is Paraguay's second leading cotton exporter. Senator Domingo Laino, the Liberal Party candidate, is an economist by training and a politician by profession.

But the challenge posed by strong opposition candidacies poses a great test of the stated willingness of Paraguay's rulers to play by new democratic rules.

Threats From Military

"Our decision is to co-govern with the glorious and immortal Colorado Party for centuries to come," bellowed Lino Oviedo, an army general second in military power only to President Andrés Rodriguez, last week.

General Oviedo, a declared backer of Mr. Wasmosy, added that Paraguay's military would continue to rule with the Colorados "no matter whom it bothers, no matter whom it hurts, no matter whom it pinches, no matter who whines."

These threats, repeated several times during the campaign's final days, are widely interpreted here as an attempt to intimidate wavering Colorado Party members to back their candidates. Rather than threatening a coup, the commander of Paraguay's tank corps appears to be warning voters: Colorados or chaos.

Such muscular warnings reflect desperation over a deeply split party.

Six months ago, Mr. Wasmosy appeared to lose a Colorado primary, winning only 41 percent of the votes. An initial count gave 48 percent of the votes to Luis María Argaña, a candidate backed by Alfredo Stroessner, the dictator who ruled Paraguay until he was forced into exile by a coup in 1989.

But President Rodriguez, who carried out the 1989 coup, had no intention of allowing a restoration of the Stroessner wing of the party. After closed-door machinations, a new vote count was conducted and Mr. Wasmosy was announced the winner two months ago.

Far from accepting defeat gracefully, Mr. Argaña gave repeated news conferences this week describing his party rival as "the fraud candidate." He all but instructed his followers to vote for Mr. Caballero Vargas, an independent candidate who is a great-grandson of the founder of the Colorado Party.

On the paper ballots, Paraguay's 1.7 million voters can split their votes between presidential candidates and candidates for congress and state governships.

With Mr. Caballero Vargas leading in polls concluded two weeks ago, observers fear that a small margin of victory would be contested in election courts that are controlled by Colorados.

In Asunción, and throughout Paraguay, voting is a novelty.

Editors' Notes

A sports article last Sunday discussed personal problems that sometimes develop between male coaches and the female athletes they are coaching. It mentioned examples of inappropriate behavior.

Discussing the case of a Manhattan figure skating coach by name, the article described an anonymous letter-writing campaign in which parents accused him of having abused students.

The Times had not obtained or seen any of the letters. Their existence was reported by two people who themselves insisted on anonymity. The use of anonymous accusations, especially when obtained second-hand, was unfair.

The article also omitted attribution for another accusation against the coach — that he was trying to lure a colleague's students away — and omitted his response. That accusation was made by the colleague, who was collecting the letters of complaint; the coach denies it.

Cuban Groups Seek Lifting of U.S. Embargo

By HOWARD W. FRENCH
Special to The New York Times

MIAMI, May 8 — With Cuba facing an economic crisis, five of the country's most prominent dissident groups have written to President Clinton pleading for a change in American policies that are deepening the island's political and economic isolation.

In a two-page letter delivered to Administration officials this week, the dissident organizations called Washington's economic embargo against Cuba and its policy of encouraging its allies to also adopt trade restrictions "outdated" and "counterproductive."

"We insist that the Government of the United States must change its policy toward Cuba," said the letter from the five groups, many of whose members have been repeatedly arrested or harassed.

With the Cuban economy already reeling from the disintegration of the former East bloc and a cutoff in aid, the letter's authors said the unremitting hostility from Washington resulted only in "dangerous tensions and narrowing of space for diplomatic and political negotiations."

Analysts of Cuban affairs say the letter to Mr. Clinton is the boldest overture so far by the dissidents, who have been issuing increasingly open appeals for months for a new American approach to the island.

Although they say there is little chance that a three-decade-old American embargo against Cuba will soon force the Government of Fidel Castro from power, the dissidents have said that the severe decline in living conditions on the island discouraged the Government from considering reforms that would require greater individual liberties.

Moreover, they say, the weakening of the Cuban economy increases the likelihood of a chaotic transition when change finally does come to Cuba.

"Our position is that we must relax the embargo if we wish to see reforms in Cuba," said Rolando Prats, one of the dissidents, who delivered the letter to Clinton Administration officials during a visit to the United States. "Some say this will only strengthen Castro, but we don't believe so. If the U.S. makes a first step, Castro will be obliged to make a step as well."

Mr. Prats, who spoke from New York by telephone, is the president of a group called the Cuban Democratic Socialist Current.

In recent weeks the economy has deteriorated further with reports that a powerful storm in March destroyed already scarce housing throughout much of the island and ruined vital crops from sugar to orange and plantain. Cuban officials have also recently reported the spread of of a mysterious eye disease that some have linked to growing malnutrition.

"The economy is only half of what it was in 1989," said Andrew Zimbalist, an economist who specializes in Cuban affairs at Smith College, in Northampton, Mass. Mr. Zimbalist said there were signs that the economy was "bottoming out" after several years of steep decline, but added, "With things as bad as they are and with malnutrition rearing its head for the first time in decades, it is not clear to me what is going to happen."

As their economic situation has grown more difficult, Cuban officials have themselves echoed the dissidents' request that the embargo be relaxed, suggesting that any such move by Washington would be followed by changes in Cuban policy.

In an unusual appeal during a news conference last month, Ricardo Alarcón, the former Foreign Minister who is now president of Cuba's National Assembly, asked the Clinton Administration to "give it a try."

Clinton Administration officials have not publicly responded to the dissidents' letter or to official appeals like that one. Calls this week to senior national security officials in the Administration were not returned.

"No one is rushing to take this on," said Peter Hakim, president of Inter-American Dialogue, a Washington group that studies policy in the region. "Cuba is one of those issues that is caught in a time warp. The positions on both sides are very hard and the political costs of moving forward very high."

PERU CITIZENSHIP SELLS FOR $25,000

Government Is Seeking More Investment, but Some Say the Move Is Degrading

By NATHANIEL C. NASH
Special to The New York Times

LIMA, Peru — Struggling to attract foreign investment, primarily from Hong Kong and elsewhere in Asia, Peru will soon begin selling what many here consider an inappropriate item for free-market commerce: Peruvian citizenship.

The price will be $25,000 for the head of a family and $2,000 each for immediate family members.

This is considered remarkably low by some Government officials here, but necessarily so because of the depths of the country's troubles with guerrilla violence, poverty, recession and, most recently, an army prone to sending tanks into the street in a show of force.

"Peru needs investment from abroad, and there are a lot of people in Hong Kong and other Asian countries looking for higher profitability," said Victor Joy Way, a member of the Peruvian Congress and promoter of the plan. "In the case of people from Hong Kong, they have the added concern of their uncertain relationship with China, and are looking for an extra measure of security against future events. That is what we are offering."

'Cheapens Our Pride'

Many Peruvians, whose self-images have been beaten down over the last year, say the merchandising of the Peruvian passport is another blow.

"I know we are having problems, but you feel that this cheapens our pride, putting a price tag on the right to be a Peruvian," said a former senior diplomat who insisted on anonymity. "It's auctioning our nationality to whatever price the market brings. It's very sad."

Under the project promoted by President Alberto K. Fujimori, the Constitution was amended in April to allow exemptions to a law requiring that foreigners live two years in Peru before they can become naturalized citizens.

Now Hong Kong Chinese, for example, who put down $25,000 and pass a screening test by the Peruvian consul there can receive citizenship and a passport without ever setting foot in Peru. They would have voting rights and be taxed under Peruvian law. The Government says it is looking for those with at least $100,000 to invest in Peru, although no firm commitment to invest is required.

Government officials say they need to offer full citizenship because of Peru's history of nationalizing foreign companies or requiring that any company operated by a foreign investor be 51 percent owned by a Peruvian.

A Need for Incentives

Though the plan has been roundly criticized by opponents of the Fujimori Government, it reflects Peru's desperate need for some of the tens of billions of foreign investment dollars that have poured into Latin America in the last three years.

Peruvians are well aware that Japanese, Chinese and Koreans are increasing investments in Mexico, Chile, Venezuela and Argentina. And as any free-market economist will point out, Peru needs to offer market incentives — like citizenship — to compete.

"Hey, we are a poor country, so the price of our citizenship would not be as high as in the United States or Chile," said Enrique Chirinos Soto, a member of the Peruvian Congress.

At the same time, other Latin American countries are developing programs to promote the immigration of Asian entrepreneurs, though none besides Peru are selling passports.

In Argentina, the Government gives investors permanent residence status if they deposit $30,000 with the central bank for 120 days, an enticement that has been used widely by Koreans.

U.S., Too, Has Inducement

In Chile, where foreigners have traditionally found it difficult to obtain a residence visa, the laws are opening to those with capital and with technical skills, like engineers. In Mexico, investors must invest $160,000 for permanent residence status and wait five years to apply for citizenship.

Even in industrialized countries immigration policies reflect a wish to attract capital. In Canada, permanent residence status can be had for bringing in $500,000 of capital, and the United States accepts foreigners as residents who bring $1 million with them.

Perhaps the two countries that have focused most on the needs of Hong Kong Chinese to find other places for their investments before the island is returned to China in 1997 are Taiwan and Singapore. In Taiwan, citizenship is granted three months after a Hong Kong Chinese buys property. Singapore grants permanent residence to anyone from Hong Kong investing $500,000, and then considers citizenship after five years.

The Peruvian program has generated intense controversy. Several news weeklies have asserted that a Hong Kong-based company, Blooming Strong Development Ltd., has an exclusive contract with the Government to sell the citizenships and passports and that Mr. Joy Way has a financial interest in Blooming. Mr. Joy Way denies having any connection.

The weeklies have also charged that a number of visiting Hong Kong Chinese who have been wined and dined by President Fujimori and have said they plan to invest large amounts here have shady, if not criminal, backgrounds.

"Selling citizenship will only bring the wrong people," said Fernando Olivera, a member of Congress and the chief opponent of the plan. "Real businesses will invest here because there are profits to be made, and they don't need a passport for that. What you need is the right business climate."

British Health Officials Alter AIDS Strategy to Focus on High-Risk Groups

By WILLIAM E. SCHMIDT
Special to The New York Times

LONDON, May 8 — With rates of AIDS and H.I.V. infection in Britain staying well below those in many other Western nations, health officials are rethinking their strategy toward the disease. The Government is trimming some AIDS programs and focusing resources on the people at highest risk.

Health Secretary Virginia Bottomley said this week that the Government wanted "to bring our thinking about H.I.V. and AIDS more into the mainstream," adding that it was time to regard the disease as a health threat on the same order as cancer and heart disease.

A spokesman for the Department of Health said the Government did not intend to play down the threat AIDS poses to the population and would continue public education programs, including national advertising campaigns stressing that everyone, including heterosexuals, must take precautions against infection.

"What we want to do is make our response slightly less broad-brush, and target our resources the way we do for other diseases, like breast cancer, where you screen for women in the higher-risk groups," the spokesman said.

AIDS researchers say the reappraisal is based in part on pressure on the Government to make more efficient use of limited public resources for social service programs, including criticism that the Government has overstated the threat to the general public.

High Heterosexual Increase

The Government estimates that 20,000 to 30,000 Britons are infected with the human immunodeficiency virus, which causes AIDS, and surveillance and anonymous blood screening show that in the last 12 months, 26 percent of new H.I.V. infections involved heterosexual contact, the highest rate ever. At the same time, there has been very little growth of cases attributed to intravenous drug use.

Until now, 4,572 Britons have died from AIDS, fewer than the 6,500 predicted by the Government in 1991, and barely one-third of the toll of 13,000 estimated in a 1988 study.

Critics contend that the Government is endangering some of the prevention and service projects that apparently helped keep infection levels relatively low. Among other things, they argue that the Government runs the risk of playing down the menace AIDS poses to heterosexuals while embarking on programs that could add to a perception that AIDS is merely a disease of homosexuals and drug addicts.

"The political message they are sending is very frightening," said Paul Barton of the Terrence Higgins Trust, a national charity that works with people with AIDS and H.I.V. infections. "They are saying that AIDS is not a real risk."

While epidemiologists agree that it would be dangerous and foolhardy for anyone to argue that AIDS does did not pose a threat to the general population, Dr. Nicholas Day, the director of the Institute of Public Health at Cambridge University and chairman of a national group studying the spread of the epidemic, says it makes sense for the Government to target its resources more carefully.

As in the United States, AIDS specialists here say, cases of H.I.V. infection tend to cluster. "The threat is much greater to some people than to others, and if you want effective action with a limited budget, it makes sense to put your money where the problem is, and target those groups and areas that show the highest levels of infection," Dr. Day said.

Among other things, that might mean spending more money on programs aimed at immigrants and ethnic minorities. Recent data show that more than 70 percent of the new cases attributed to heterosexual contact involve people who say they were infected abroad.

As part of its decision to reallocate funds, and to reduce AIDS expenditures in communities where the virus represents little if any current threat, the Government announced last fall that it was cutting funds for grants to local governments for AIDS projects by about 18 percent, to about $19.5 million.

The Government said last week that it was also reducing grants to voluntary organizations that provide services to those who have AIDS or who are infected with H.I.V. The three-year grant for the Terrence Higgins Trust, Britain's largest such organization, will be reduced from $710,000 to $235,000.

But separate categories of funds for medical care and treatment, national education programs, and medical research were not affected by the recent cuts. In the next fiscal year, the Government is spending about 10 percent more, or about $314 million, to help local governments provide for the care and treatment of a growing number of AIDS patients.

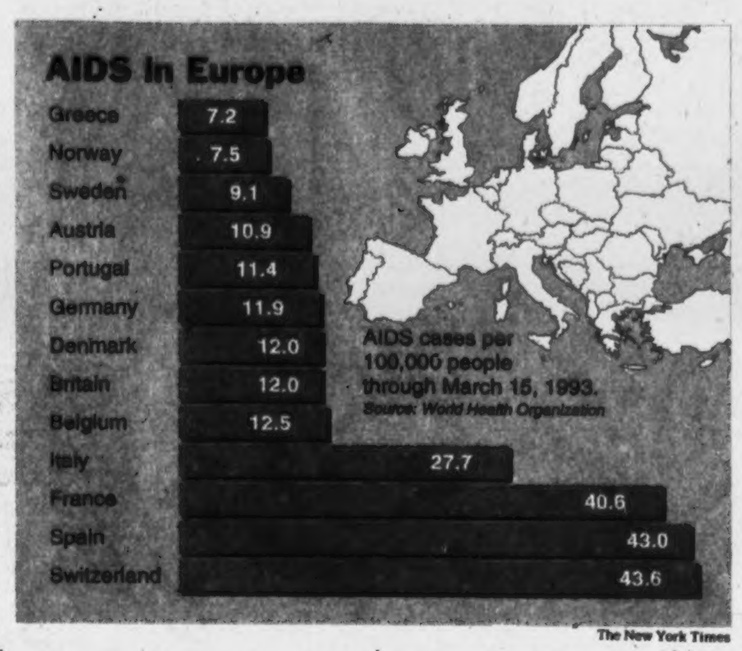
For more than five years, the Government has provided $17 million annually for leaflets, training packets and national advertisements for AIDS prevention. In the coming budget year, the Government will not touch nearly $50 million set aside for AIDS research over five years.

Health Department officials say that much of the infrastructure needed to combat the disease is already in place. In an interview with the BBC this week, Mrs. Bottomley said that the Government no longer needed "to go for the kind of pump-priming, starting up priority that we did when it was a new, strange and taboo disease."

Government officials argue that the incidence of AIDS is relatively low in Britain because the Government and voluntary agencies have done such a good job at spreading the word on the danger of the disease.

Specialists say it reflects a pattern across much of Northern Europe, where a reduction in risky sexual behavior, largely in response to public education campaigns, appears to have slowed infection rates among homosexual men or at least caused them to level off.

In addition, they say, the low incidence of the virus among intravenous drug users reflects the early introduction in Britain and some other Northern European nations of needle exchange programs to stop addicts from sharing contaminated needles.



For more than five years, the British Government has provided $17 million annually for leaflets, training packets and national advertisements, like this one above, for AIDS awareness and prevention.

British Leader Links Tories' Election Loss To Economic Slump

LONDON, May 8 (AP) — The governing Conservatives have been wiped out in local elections and suffered a stunning defeat in a special race for a parliamentary seat, a loss that Prime Minister John Major attributed to the economy.

The landslide, in Thursday's vote, cut the Conservatives' majority in the 650-member House of Commons to 19.

"People feel bruised, they feel hurt," Mr. Major said on Friday. "I think they were determined to give the Government a bloody nose."

Some Conservatives were calling for him to dismiss the Chancellor of the Exchequer, Norman Lamont, whose policies have been blamed for prolonging the recession.

The Conservatives suffered a surprising defeat in a special House of Commons election in Newbury, a prosperous southern England district that the party held for 69 years. The vote was called after the incumbent died in February.

"The people of this country will give them no more credit and today they have bounced the check," David Rendel of the centrist Liberal Democrats said. He won the seat with a huge 22,055-vote majority.

Traditional Strongholds Fall

In the elections for the 47 county councils of England and Wales, the Conservatives lost all but one — Buckinghamshire — of the 16 authorities they had controlled. Conservatives lost to the Labor Party and the Liberal Democrats in their traditional heartland of southern England.

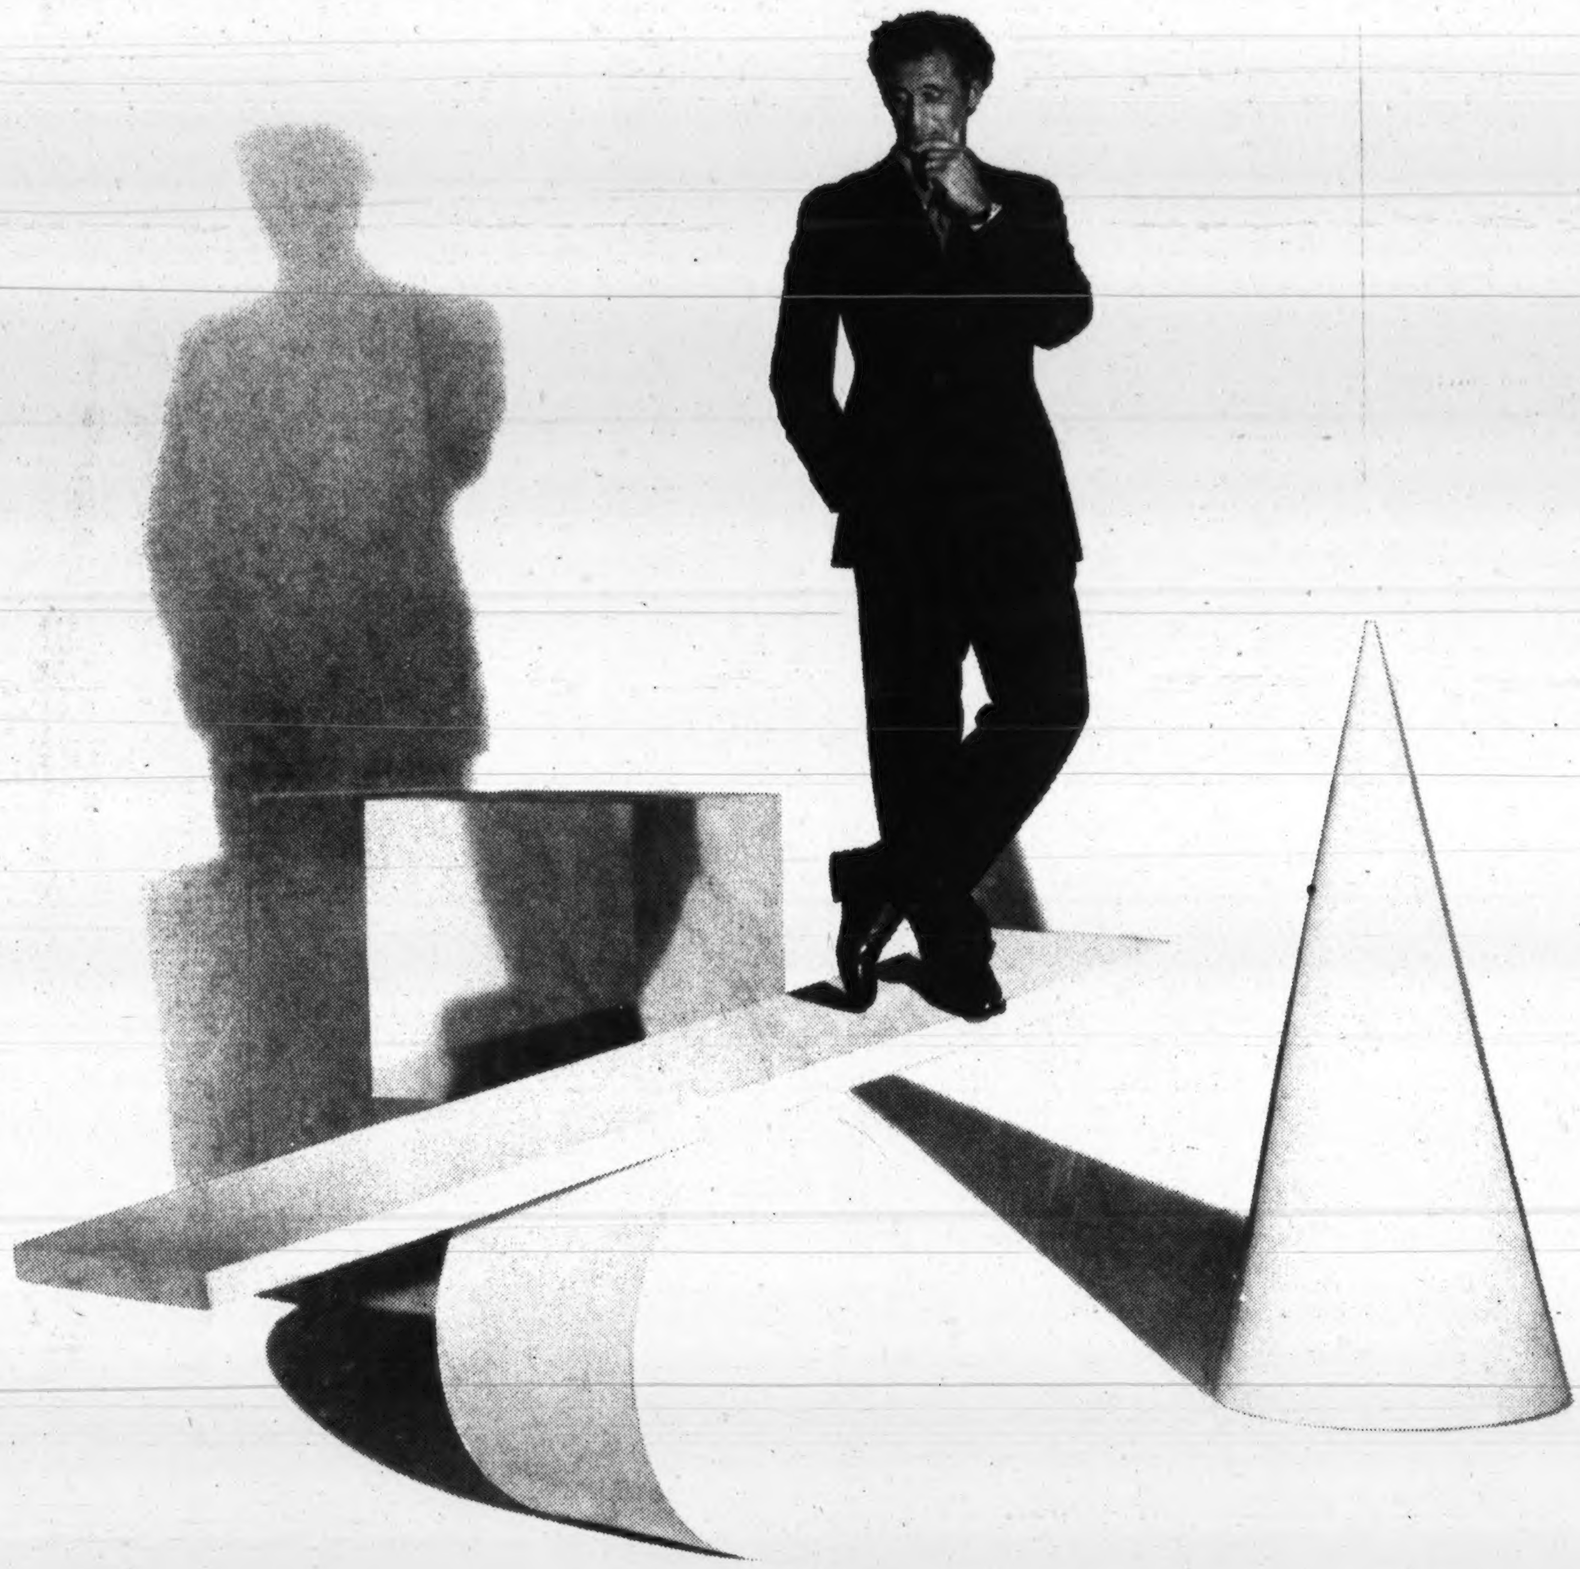
In April 1992, Mr. Major led the Conservatives to their fourth successive victory in national elections on promises of an imminent economic recovery and a strong currency and a pledge not to introduce new taxes.

But the pound was devalued last September and the Government now plans to raise taxes to control a growing budget deficit. But there have been signs of a modest economic growth.

"There is a strong feeling that this is something the country didn't have to go through," Anthony King, a professor of government at Essex University, said of the recession of recent years.

"This does light a fuse under the Government which will require them to change course," said a leader of the Liberal Democrats, Paddy Ashdown.

Jack Straw, the Labor Party's environmental spokesman, said the result was "a really major slap in the face of the Government."



Tailoring that defies gravity.

U.S. CITES EVIDENCE IN A PLOT ON BUSH

Officials Link Assassination Plan to Iraq but Say Signs Are Not Yet Conclusive

By DOUGLAS JEHL
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 8 — The Clinton Administration has found strong evidence that the Iraqi Government directed a 17-member squad in a plot to assassinate former President Bush during his visit to Kuwait three weeks ago, Government officials said today.

They said signs of Iraqi sponsorship were not yet conclusive. But some senior policymakers were said to have become convinced that Iraq was behind the attack, and the officials said early consideration was being given to how the United States should respond.

It appeared unlikely, however, that the Administration would authorize any quick action against Iraq. The White House remains preoccupied with finding a way to halt aggression in Bosnia, and officials said they would make no decisions until a team of Federal investigators dispatched to Kuwait made a clearer judgment about Iraqi involvement.

"We've got enough on our hands with Bosnia to begin other kinds of discussion before the evidence is clear," an Administration official said today after a White House meeting between President Clinton and his top national security advisers.

U.S. Trial Suggested

All but one of the suspects, including 11 Iraqi nationals, are now in custody in Kuwait, where they have been charged with conspiring to kill Mr. Bush. Among the options being discussed within the Administration is a request that Kuwait allow them to be tried in the United States.

But some of Mr. Clinton's top advisers have indicated to their colleagues that more direct retribution may be required, officials said. They said top officials at the Central Intelligence Agency and the Pentagon had argued that a state-ordered conspiracy against a former President's life requires punishment of the Government that is responsible.

None of the plotters ever got near Mr. Bush, and some of them were arrested before the American entourage arrived in Kuwait on April 14. United States officials initially expressed skepticism that the group intended anything more than sabotage.

But the Administration began to revise that assessment after reviewing evidence that an arsenal smuggled by the group into Kuwait from Iraq included a sophisticated car bomb. While refusing to provide specific details, American officials said today that the design of the bomb and other evidence pointed strongly to Iraqi Government support for the plot.

Another Problem for Clinton

The emerging evidence of Iraqi sponsorship of the plot was first reported in today's issue of The Washington Post. The White House spokesman, George Stephanopoulos, today refused to say whether the Administration had obtained such evidence, but declared: "If we determine Iraq was involved in state-sponsored terrorism, the United States will take appropriate action against Iraq."

Even if that decision is postponed, the development could raise a new foreign policy problem for Mr. Clinton, who is still seeking support at home and abroad for action aimed at halting Serbian aggression in Bosnia.

While the White House meeting this morning was to have focused exclusively on Bosnia, Administration officials said it was briefly sidetracked as Mr. Clinton and his top deputies discussed the evidence against Iraq.

Among those dispatched to Kuwait in recent days to look into the case have been representatives of the Secret Service, the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Central Intelligence Agency, officials said. Some members of the team returned to the United States this morning.

Kuwait Cites Confessions

At the same time, Administration officials said United States diplomats in Kuwait still hoped to interview the suspects, who the Kuwaiti authorities say have confessed about their plans and Iraqi backing.

The Kuwaiti Government said at least one suspect had confessed under investigation to being an officer in Iraq's secret intelligence service. Others told the Kuwaitis that the group had received training in a camp outside Baghdad, and Government officials said today that they were eager to confirm those reports.

Without offering specific details, they suggested that there might also be forensic evidence showing that the car bomb seized by the Kuwaiti authorities in the plot was of Iraqi design and origin.

American officials said today they now have no doubt that the group planned one or more remote-controlled car bomb attacks during Mr. Bush's visit to Kuwait City April 14 though 16, when the former President received an award from the Emir in recognition of the American-led military operation that drove the Iraqis from Kuwait.

Those arrested by the Kuwaiti authorities include 5 Kuwaiti residents of Iraqi origin as well as the 11 Iraqis, who had illegally crossed the border into Kuwait. Another Iraqi is still being sought by the authorities.

All have been charged with conspiracy to kill Mr. Bush and to execute "other acts of terrorism, infiltration and robbery."

Kuwait did not advise the United States about its discovery of the plot until well after Mr. Bush arrived in the country, an omission that angered the State Department and the Secret Service. A spokesman for Mr. Bush said the former President was told of the case during his stay in Kuwait but had "nothing but total faith in the Secret Service, so he just continued his trip."

MUSLIMS AND SERBS BACK BOSNIA TRUCE

U.N. Officer Says Accord Lets Peacekeepers Move Into Besieged Town in East

By STEPHEN KINZER
Special to The New York Times

BELGRADE, Yugoslavia, Sunday, May 9 — Commanders of Muslim and Serbian forces in Bosnia and Herzegovina signed a cease-fire accord on Saturday that provides for peacekeepers to move into the besieged Muslim enclave of Zepa, the senior United Nations officer in the country said.

Although the agreement was not signed by any representative of the Croats, the third warring faction in Bosnia, the United Nations officer, Lieut. Gen. Philippe Morillon, said the cease-fire applied to all of Bosnia.

Reports from Sarajevo said the accord called for United Nations soldiers from a Ukrainian peacekeeping unit to move into Zepa before the agreement takes effect at noon today, local time. The vastly better equipped Bosnian Serbs have reportedly been close to capturing the town, which along with Gorazde and Srebrenica, is one of the few Muslim enclaves in the eastern region that has not yet fallen.

The accord also provides for the demilitarization of Zepa by 5 P.M. Wednesday, but complete details were not immediately available. The town is flooded with Muslim refugees, and hundreds are said to be sick or wounded.

General Morillon has been seeking permission to send United Nations soldiers into Zepa and Gorazde, disarm their Muslim defenders, and arrange for the immediate shipment of relief supplies and the evacuation of sick and wounded residents. The agreement on Zepa was signed after intense negotiations at the Sarajevo airport between the commander of the Serbian fighters in Bosnia, Gen. Ratko Mladic, and the commander of the Bosnian Government Army, Gen. Sefer Halilovic.

An Unexpected Veto

United Nations observers tried to cross battle lines into Zepa several times in recent days, but were turned back by Bosnian Serbs. General Morillon finally reached an agreement on Saturday morning with Serbian officers, but it was unexpectedly vetoed by the head of Bosnia's Muslim-led government, President Alija Izetbegovic.

Mr. Izetbegovic said he could not accept it because it called for "unilateral disarmament." After President Izetbegovic's veto, General Morillon opened urgent talks that led to the cease-fire announcement.

"I will tell President Izetbegovic this is a matter of life and death, and that what we did in Srebrenica has to be done now in Zepa and Gorazde," General Morillon said before the talks began. "I saved Srebrenica and I will save Zepa, too."

A similar agreement mediated by the United Nations recently prevented Srebrenica from being overrun by Bosnian Serbs and allowed the evacuation of many of the sick and wounded there. Critics said that accord amounted to a surrender because it left Srebrenica with only a small buffer force of Canadian peacekeepers.

No Observers in Zepa

Because there are no independent observers in Zepa, even United Nations officials do not know how bad conditions there have become. A radio broadcast from Sarajevo quoted leaders in Zepa as appealing to General Morillon to understand that Saturday "is certainly our last day, unless you come and save us."

The broadcast from the Bosnian capital asserted that Zepa's defenders had run out of ammunition and that Serbian forces were pressing artillery and infantry attacks. Ham radio operators there have reported hundreds of casualties there over the last few days.

The agreement requires the Serbs to pull back from their current siege lines around Zepa. Muslim defenders would be allowed to leave Zepa, but only after surrendering their weapons.

The Serbs are far better equipped than the Muslims but have come under intense new political pressure in recent days. The Governments of Yugoslavia and its dominant republic, Serbia, announced on Thursday that they were cutting the supply lines through which they have been sending Bosnian Serbs weapons, food and other supplies for more than a year.

The Bosnian Serbs also face the possibility of allied air strikes led by the United States now that an assembly of Bosnian Serbs voted last week for the third time to reject a peace plan drawn up by international mediators.

Zepa, Gorazde and Srebrenica are among six war-torn Bosnian towns that were designated "safe areas" on Thursday by the United Nations Security Council in an effort to deter the Serbs from seizing more territory.

The Council demanded "the immediate cessation of armed attacks or any hostile acts against these safe areas, and the withdrawal of all Bosnian Serb military or paramilitary units from these towns to a distance" from which "they cease to constitute a menace to their security and their inhabitants."

Some leaders of the Bosnian Serbs are dissatisfied with that formula because it requires them to accept a form of truce in towns they had hoped to capture. Some officials of the Muslim-led Bosnian Government also dislike the arrangement, saying that it forces their fighters into giving up.

As General Morillon sought to resolve the dispute over Zepa on Saturday, fighting near the airport at Sarajevo forced an interruption of aid flights for several hours. The flights resumed late in the afternoon.

U.S. and Allies Still Divided Over Intervention in Bosnia avoid having to engage in military action on Bosnia, and that waiting for the referendum was their latest excuse.

"Several European countries are now looking to the referendum as another marker and another reason to delay action," a senior Administration official said. "They would like to do more by remote control."

But for all the complaints about European inaction from American officials, a delay could also prove useful to Mr. Clinton since polls have shown that most Americans are opposed to United States military intervention in Bosnia. President Clinton evinces no inclination to go it alone on Bosnia. Instead, he ordered Mr. Christopher to engage in more telephone consultations with the allies.

Different Views

Nevertheless, it seems increasingly apparent, American officials said, that the United States and Europe have fundamentally different views of the Balkan conflict. If given a choice between widening the conflict by lifting the arms embargo and engaging in air strikes, or simply letting the Serbs win, the Europeans, these officials said, would probably quietly prefer a Serbian victory. They just do not want to say that out loud, the officials said.

The only thing that might spur the Europeans into action, American officials said, is the United States' deciding unilaterally on military steps and demanding that they fall into line, or the Bosnian Serbs' taking aggressive new steps that could trigger a wider European war.

"The only decision today is that the President wants to digest what Christopher has told him," a senior Administration official said.

Officials could not explain why Mr. Clinton seemed so upbeat Friday about the prospects of reaching a common strategy with the Europeans. The mood around the Administration after Mr. Clinton heard personally from Mr. Christopher was hardly one of rampant optimism that an allied consensus on Bosnia would appear soon.

The Bosnian Muslims and Croats have already accepted the peace plan drawn up by two mediators, Lord Owen and Cyrus R. Vance. The self-proclaimed Bosnian Serb parliament rejected it this week, and called for the referendum by all Bosnian Serbs on the matter next weekend.

The White House spokesman, George Stephanopoulos, did his best to mask the differences between Washington and its allies in briefing reporters after today's meeting. He said that Secretary Christopher had reported that all the allies agreed with Washington that something more must be done, but that there was no agreement yet on what.

Christopher to Press Allies

In the meantime, Mr. Clinton ordered two diplomatic holding actions today. One was to ask Mr. Christopher to work with the allies to encourage the Serbian Government of President Slobodan Milosevic to fulfill his vow to close off all borders between Serbia and Bosnia and to cut military supplies to the Bosnian Serb fighters.

The idea is to see if the Bosnian Serbs can be choked hard enough in the next week to influence their referendum in favor of accepting the peace settlement. That will not be easy, since the Bosnian Serb fighters have built up deep stocks in preparation for just such a blockade.

Feeling the pinch of international sanctions for having supported the Bosnian Serbs, Serbia announced the blockade Thursday in an effort to show support for the peace plan and in the hope of getting the sanctions on the Yugoslav federation of Serbia and Montenegro lifted.

"We certainly would like to make that tightening of the screws work," Mr. Stephanopoulos said, without explaining how the allies might do that. Senator Sam Nunn, chairman of the Senate Armed Services Committee, has suggested putting United Nations monitors on the Serbia-Bosnia border, but no country has volunteered to put their citizens in such an exposed position, even under a United Nations flag.

'Looking for Some Way Out'

While American officials have impugned the idea of the Bosnian Serb referendum, and are trying to ignore it, they have no choice but to begin trying to influence it through the blockade, because their European allies see it as a possible way out of military action, officials said. It is not clear how such a vote would be carried out.

"We don't attach any legitimacy to this referendum but the Europeans do," another American official said. "That makes engaging them to seriously consider the next military steps very hard, when they are looking for some way out."

Nevertheless, Mr. Clinton also asked Mr. Christopher to continue trying to forge a consensus with the Europeans on the President's preferred military options: bombing Bosnian Serb artillery positions and lifting the arms embargo on the Bosnian Muslims to give them a better fighting chance. Mr. Clinton hopes that if the peace plan is rejected in the referendum, the allies will be prepared for real military steps, officials said.

An Emphasis on Pressure

"We want to continue to trying to keep the focus on the need to take other measures, and to keep Milosevic's feet to the fire," said a senior Administration official. "We will continue to pressure the Europeans to take more forceful action and to continue looking at the military options. Right now the Europeans don't want to do anything. The goal is to get them to coalesce around more forceful action."

Mr. Christopher spoke this afternoon by phone with the British Foreign Secretary, Douglas Hurd; the French Foreign Minister, Alain Juppé, and the Russian Foreign Minister, Andrei V. Kozyrev.

Taking part in this morning's meeting were Vice President Al Gore; Defense Secretary Les Aspin; the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, Gen. Colin L. Powell; the United States delegate to the United Nations, Madeleine K. Albright; the national security adviser, W. Anthony Lake, and his deputy, Samuel Berger, and the White House chief of staff Thomas F. McLarty.

Croatia's Serb Enclave Feels Betrayed

By PAUL LEWIS
Special to The New York Times

KNIN, Croatia, May 7 — When the Yugoslav Government announced this week that it was severing supply lines to the Bosnian Serbs, betrayal was felt in this remote Croatian mountain town.

The self-proclaimed Republic of the Serbian Krajina, formed when Croatia declared its sovereignty, was counting on Belgrade to lead it to independence and eventual union in a greater Serbia. But the severing of supply lines would cut off shipments of oil and manufactured goods and that could determine the area's future.

The idea that President Slobodan Milosevic of Serbia, until now a leading advocate of a greater Serbia, should simultaneously betray both the Bosnian and the Krajinan Serbs produced incredulity, rage and sometimes fatalism in this enclave of 350,000 people.

A Serbian official at the refugee center in Bijelina, a few miles west of here, exclaimed: "No, no, Milosevic can't do that to us! We are Serbs!" Then he conceded that if it happened, "we are finished."

In his bunker in a front-line Serbian village on a day of Croatian bombardment, Capt. Marko Bogunovic also refused at first to believe the news.

"The corridor is the artery for the three million Serbs outside Serbia," he said, adding: "No one can divide the Serbian people. Neither Milosevic nor anyone else can do that."

Under U.N. Protection

Croatia's warring Croats and Serbs made a first peace agreement late in 1991. This made Krajina a United Nations protected area. Some 14,000 United Nations soldiers were deployed there with orders to disarm the local Serb armies and smooth the return of refugees who were forced from the area or fled the fighting.

But the peace did not last long. Croatian troops attacked southern Krajina in January, and since March the two sides have been engaged in a sullen artillery war, pounding each other's border villages to no purpose except to destroy what they cannot capture.

"This is the forgotten Balkans war," said Jenne Peterson, the chief United Nations political officer here. "This is deliberate civilian targeting by both sides with no military purpose whatsoever."

In Zagreb, Croatia's capital, Western diplomats say they suspect President Milosevic reached a secret understanding with President Franjo Tudjman of Croatia over territory on the margins of last weekend's peace talks in the Greek resort of Vouliagmeni. It was there that Radovan Karadzic, leader of the Bosnian Serbs, finally agreed to sign the international Balkans peace plan, which his Parliament defeated.

No one seems sure of the substance of this agreement, but there is a suspicion in the Zagreb diplomatic corps that President Milosevic at least offered to force the Serbs in northern, western and southern Krajina to surrender in return for Croatia's giving him the separate eastern Krajina region, which directly abuts his territory.

In his small cluttered office in Knin's equally small town hall, Djordje Bjegovic, the Prime Minister of the self-styled Krajina republic, at first reacted aggressively to a suggestion that his country's supply lines would be cut, saying this would just force him "to continue the war and take something else."

But Mr. Bjegovic is a moderate who was brought to power this year by President Milosevic when he apparently decided he wanted the Krajina Serbs to make peace with Zagreb. He duly emphasized that he and the President, Goran Hadzic, were preparing "a plan to end the war" that they would soon present to Krajina's Serbian parliament.

Throughout the long negotiations that eventually produced the Balkan peace plan, the Serbs of Bosnia and Krajina pressed for a Serbian-controlled land corridor linking them with the Serbian Government in Belgrade. And the Bosnian Serb parliament mainly rejected the plan last week, after Dr. Karadzic reluctantly signed it, because it provided only for a United Nations-controlled road link between the Serbian parts of Bosnia and Herzegovina and the Krajina Serbs. Eventually Krajina was to become an autonomous region of Croatia.

Some Gains by Croatia

Some progress toward these goals was made in western Krajina, but elsewhere the Serbs refused to disarm or allow the return of the victims of their ethnic cleansing. Then on Jan. 22, with elections due the next month, President Tudjman gave in to nationalist pressure and sent his army to attack southern Krajina.

His forces made some small gains, capturing the site of the destroyed Maslenica bridge, which links the southern Dalmatian coast to Croatia and is vital to restarting the profitable summer tourist trade. They also captured the Peruca hydroelectric dam, which provides power for much of the Dalmatian coast but which is no longer operational, as well as Zemunik Airport.

These gains proved of limited value since they remained within range of Serbian artillery. In March the Croats agreed to hand over control to United Nations forces, but Krajina's Serbian parliament rejected the plan, and the fighting continued.

In the village of Smilcic, about six miles north of Benkovac and only a few hundred yards from the front line, Captain Bogunovic told visitors the population had dropped from 350 to a dozen or so. The Serbian Orthodox Church of the Holy Archangels has had its roof and belfry blown off. The school is in ruins and almost every house has taken a direct hit and been gutted by fire. The surrounding fields are no longer cultivated.

Meanwhile, the forgotten war has reduced most of Krajina to a dispiriting wasteland.

Driving down here from Zagreb, visitors pass through the once-famous Plitvice National Park, a natural wonderland of ravines and waterfalls. But most of the hotels and restaurants were managed by Croats and have been reduced to charred ruins today. More than 2,000 Croats who worked in the park are now refugees in Zagreb, victims of the same ethnic cleansing that has left scores of Serbian homes in ruins around the Croatian capital.

Once Knin was important as the rail juncture linking the rest of former Yugoslavia with the ports of the Dalmatian coast. Today, hundreds of freight cars are rusting away.

The New York Times

For Knin, the decision to cut off the Bosnian Serbs is bad news.

Balkan Update

In WASHINGTON yesterday, Secretary of State Warren Christopher reported that although the United States' European allies agree that stronger action must be taken in Bosnia, they are still holding back on deciding what those steps should be, wanting to wait for this week's vote in Bosnia on whether to accept an international peace plan.

President Clinton asked Mr. Christopher to work with the allies to encourage the Serbian government to fulfill its vow to close off borders and cut military supplies to the Bosnian Serb fighters.

In LOZNICA, YUGOSLAVIA, and other sites on the Drina River, previously busy routes in the supply lines from Serbia to the Bosnian Serbs, truck traffic has been halted.

In KNIN, CROATIA, residents of the tiny self-proclaimed Republic of the Serbian Krajina expressed outrage and despair that Serbia would withdraw its support from the Bosnian Serbs since a blockade will have a disastrous impact on them as well.

In SARAJEVO, the Bosnian capital, the Muslim-led Government and rebel Serbian military commanders signed a new cease-fire agreement for Bosnia and Herzegovina to begin at noon today. The agreement was signed after talks between the two rival military chiefs and the commander of United Nations troops in Bosnia, Gen. Philippe Morillon of France.

United Nations relief flights to Sarajevo were halted briefly after the airport was fired at, United Nations officials said. The airport, ringed by suburbs held by rival Muslims, Serbs and Croats, has sometimes been caught in a crossfire and occasionally it has been directly shelled or shot at.

Conflict in the Balkans: Trying to Cut the Cord

Truck Traffic Evaporating at Serbian Border

By STEPHEN KINZER
Special to The New York Times

LOZNICA, Yugoslavia, May 8 — The strategic bridge over the Drina River here, which only last week was a busy supply link between Serbia and Bosnia, was eerily quiet today.

Trucks laden with supplies for Bosnian Serbs and their army used to cross here at the rate of 50 to 100 per day. Now, Yugoslav customs officers sit for hours without seeing a single one.

"We received new orders on Friday telling us not to let any cargo across," said one officer. "By now the truckers know that there's no point in trying."

The Governments of Serbia and its parent state, federal Yugoslavia, announced Thursday night they were cutting supply lines they had used for more than a year to send weapons, ammunition and fuel to forces of the Bosnian Serbs. They took the step after an assembly of Bosnian Serbs defiantly voted a third time to reject a peace plan that the Bosnian Muslims and Croats have already accepted.

In Loznica and other nearby towns where bridges cross the Drina border between Serbia and Bosnia, traffic has suddenly evaporated, truckers and residents said. One angry trucker complained that customs officers had refused on Friday to allow him to take a carton of cigarettes across the river to a family gathering.

"This is a terrible situation, totally unfair," he said. "United Nations convoys are crossing these bridges every day bringing tons of food to the Muslims, but we can't bring anything to our own people. The Serbs in Bosnia are our brothers, and we are abandoning them. This is very bad."

Although the new Serbian blockade may be bad for the trucking business, and even worse for fighters who have relied heavily on arms from Serbia during the 13 months of the Bosnian war, political leaders in Belgrade say they hope their blockade will show the world that they are leaving the Bosnian Serbs to fend for themselves.

With this show of independence, Serbia hopes to avoid further punishment from abroad in the form of sanctions. Foreign leaders are skeptical of such Serbian proclamations because they have often proven empty in the past. But a tour along part of the border today suggested that the new blockade is being seriously enforced.

"Things haven't been this quiet here for a long time," sighed a woman named Rosa, who runs a small grocery store opposite a bridge in the town of Mali Zvornik. "Trucks get stopped even before they get here."

Under terms of the embargo, food and medical supplies may still be carried across the Drina into Bosnia. But at a new military checkpoint on the road between Loznica and Mali Zvornik, soldiers were letting no cargo pass, except for United Nations relief trucks en route to Bosnian Muslim towns.

On the bridge at Loznica today, soldiers allowed buses and private cars to cross into Bosnia only after close inspection. A few empty trucks were also allowed to cross.

There are dozens of crossings over the Drina, and it was impossible to ascertain whether all of them are now as difficult to cross as the ones in Loznica and Mali Zvornik.

China has gradually been distancing itself from the Khmer Rouge since the Cambodian peace accords were signed in 1991, and the relationship has sunk to a new low in the last few days. United Nations peacekeeping soldiers patrolled the streets of Phnom Penh.

Chinese Support for Khmer Rouge Grows Cooler

By NICHOLAS D. KRISTOF
Special to The New York Times

BEIJING, May 8 — Back in 1965, when China was still a deep shade of red, an impressionable Cambodian in his 30's hiked through the jungles from Indochina and began a long friendship with the Chinese authorities.

His name was Pol Pot, and the support he received from China's leadership proved crucial throughout his subsequent career.

Alliance May Be Crumbling

Beijing supplied the weaponry he used to seize power in Cambodia in 1975, stood by him as he presided over the slaughter of more than a million Cambodians and supported him diplomatically and militarily after he and his Khmer Rouge forces were deposed at the beginning of 1979.

In a region where alliances are often fickle, the friendship between China and the Khmer Rouge has been one of the most durable around. But now that friendship may finally be crumbling, with far-reaching implications for Indochina.

"We've seen more tensions between the Khmer Rouge and China in recent years," said a diplomat from one of China's neighbors. "There's been a cooling of ties. But it's not yet possible to say that there's been a final break."

The problem for China is that while it has abandoned many of its Maoist policies and is now trying on pin-striped business suits, some of its former comrades-in-arms are still wearing camouflage gear. Aside from the Khmer Rouge, Maoist rebels are active in such places as Peru and the Philippines. In December, the Maoist guerrillas of the Shining Path organization set off a car bomb near the Chinese Embassy in Lima to protest against Beijing's revisionism.

While China has gradually been distancing itself from the Khmer Rouge since the peace accords on Cambodia were signed in Paris in 1991, the last few days marked a new low in the relationship.

On Tuesday, troops believed to be from the Khmer Rouge attacked a group of Chinese engineers working in Cambodia, wounding some of them. And on Thursday, the Khmer Rouge boycotted talks in Beijing attended by the three other Cambodian factions.

Chinese in Cambodia Attacked

The Chinese engineers were probably attacked with Chinese weapons, for China has been the main supplier of the Khmer Rouge. The official Chinese news media blamed the Khmer Rouge for the attack, but the Foreign Ministry has said it is still investigating.

"It is still unclear who was behind the bombardment," said Wu Jianmin, the Foreign Ministry spokesman.

Later, the Foreign Ministry was asked whether China's relationship with the Khmer Rouge remained one of friendship. The ministry responded a day later with one sentence stating that the Paris accord should be carried out and the four factions treated equally.

In effect, the answer seemed to be: "Friendship? What friendship?"

Without backing from China, the Khmer Rouge may find it more difficult in the long run to obtain the weapons and international respectability they seek. In time, the lack of Chinese support would erode the Khmer Rouge's strength and perhaps make it easier for Cambodia to end the long turmoil and civil war.

But in the short run, a break with Beijing may free Pol Pot from any restraint. The Khmer Rouge appear, for example, to be stepping up their efforts to intimidate the Cambodian electorate and disrupt the elections scheduled for later this month.

The Khmer Rouge apparently have a considerable stockpile of weapons obtained before China cut off the supply a couple of years ago, and they may now try to turn a political competition into a military one. Thus some diplomats fear that the increased isolation of the Khmer Rouge simply means more danger for the Cambodian people.

U.N. Official Decries Pessimism

Yasushi Akashi, the head of the United Nations peacekeeping operation in Cambodia, bristled when he was asked at a news conference on Thursday if the Khmer Rouge's refusal to take part in the transition outlined in the peace accords meant that Cambodia faced continued civil war.

"A lot of journalists like to indulge in worst-case scenarios of civil war," he said. Mr. Akashi insisted that the elections would be fair and comprehensive by the yardstick of the region.

Many of China's suave diplomats appear embarrassed about their country's links with the Khmer Rouge. They are just the kind of urban intellectuals whom the Khmer Rouge tended to bludgeon to death with hammers when Cambodia was short of ammunition.

The problem for China's leaders is that their links with Pol Pot go so far back that it is difficult for them to disavow him openly. Indeed, China gave Pol Pot and his 30,000 guerrillas the military supplies that they used in 1975 to seize control of Cambodia. Those supplies were delivered via North Vietnam, which then also supported the Khmer Rouge.

A Chinese history book published two years ago suggests somewhat ruefully that Pol Pot's extremism may derive in part from his fond memories of Maoist China. The book notes that after Pol Pot's initial three-month visit in 1965, he visited again in 1968 and soaked up the excitement of the Cultural Revolution.

"This couldn't help but leave a deep impression on Pol Pot," the book said. "The leftist errors of Chinese Communism strongly affected the party's admirers."

In U.S., Hong Kong Governor Backs China, His Tormentor

By SETH FAISON

Hong Kong's Governor, Christopher Patten, has been called a colorful assortment of names by Chinese officials in recent months, including "prostitute," "serpent" and — his own favorite — "tango dancer."

So it was unusual for Mr. Patten, during a visit to Washington and New York last week, to find himself squarely on China's side of a debate over its trade status in the United States. A man China regards as its enemy came to argue China's case to President Clinton, Congress and whoever else would listen.

"It's very agreeable to find myself in such good company," Mr. Patten said with a smile, referring to his fresh alliance with Beijing. "I admit that I'm not quite used to this."

No, he said, he had not exactly come to do China's bidding. But yes, he allowed, his case for renewing China's "most favored nation" trade status is virtually identical with Beijing's.

Hong Kong could lose more than $20 billion of trade that now passes through the colony on its way between China and the United States if China's trade status were revoked and tariffs increased, Mr. Patten estimated. More trade, not less, he argued, is the best way to promote China's evolution into a modern nation.

But politics is a different story. Since last fall, when he proposed expanding the right to vote for a legislature in 1995 — the last election before Hong Kong is returned to Chinese rule in 1997 — Mr. Patten has been tagged with a stream of invective from Beijing.

"A cunning political trickster" and "colonial oppressor" are among the names he was recently called in public by Chinese officials, who oppose broadening the base of voters. They argue that in the past Britain has never shown much interest in more democracy for Hong Kong and that there is no reason for it to do so now.

Mr. Patten, 48, who left his post as chairman of the Conservative Party in Britain to become Governor of Hong Kong in July, has refused to alter his plan for the election, which would to the voting age to 18 from 21 and would allow more people to vote for legislators selected by industry.

Mr. Patten's tough stance against Beijing has earned him credibility with those in Washington who most oppose his views on trade, and who favor linking China's trade status with progress in human rights and other issues.

"He is a person who has taken risks, who is courageous," said Representative Nancy Pelosi, Democrat of California. "You listen more carefully to someone like that."

Ms. Pelosi introduced legislation in the House last month to revoke China's most-favored-nation status in 1994 if measurable progress is not made in human rights and other issues. She said that although Mr. Patten did not change her mind, he had persuaded her to adjust her proposal by eliminating its references to Hong Kong.

Factions in Cambodia Want Weapons Back

PHNOM PENH, Cambodia, May 8 (Reuters) — Three Cambodian factions that had surrendered weapons to United Nations peacekeepers have asked for them back because of renewed violence by Khmer Rouge guerrillas, United Nations and Cambodian officials said today.

The Phnom Penh Government Army, the Khmer People's National Liberation Front and royalist guerrillas made the request at a joint military meeting with the United Nations Transitional Authority in Cambodia, according to the United Nations military spokesman, Lieut. Col. Richard Palk. The factions had given up a total of 53,000 weapons, most of them small arms.

He said they feared Khmer Rouge violence, which has increased in recent weeks as a United Nations-sponsored election that will begin May 23 approaches.

"No decision has yet been made, and as far as I know no weapons have yet been released," Colonel Palk said. Releasing the weapons would signal the failure of efforts by the 22,000-member United Nations force, monitoring the 1991 peace agreement, to disarm most of the combatants in the 13-year civil war before the start of voting.

U.N. Weighs Plea to North Korea

By FRANK J. PRIAL
Special to The New York Times

UNITED NATIONS, May 8 — The Security Council plans to take up a resolution in the coming week urging North Korea to open two suspected nuclear weapons sites to international inspectors.

The resolution was drafted by the United States and is supported by Britain, France and Russia. China, which has close though not always easy relations with North Korea, is expected to abstain but not to veto the measure.

North Korea insists that it has no nuclear weapons program and says it will not submit to regular inspections so long as American troops are stationed in South Korea.

Withdrawal From Treaty

Rather than allow inspections by the International Atomic Energy Agency, a United Nations agency, North Korea said in March that it was withdrawing from the Nuclear Nonproliferation Treaty, as of June 12.

The proposed resolution calls on the Pyongyang Government to reconsider that decision. Western powers fear that North Korea's defection could prompt the departure of other countries that have signed the treaty but are suspected of running clandestine nuclear weapons programs.

Like the Western powers, China is concerned about Pyongyang's potential nuclear capabilities but has previously opposed Security Council initiatives to act on the issue. In the past, Washington has urged that economic sanctions be imposed against North Korea, but the proposed resolution makes no mention of them, diplomats said. Instead, it urges other countries to encourage Pyongyang to cooperate.

At the request of China, State Department officials have met with North Korean diplomats, and further meetings are planned. Some American officials have expressed concern that if Washington increases its reliance on Beijing to put pressure on North Korea, the Clinton Administration will have to ease its stand on China's human rights record and agree to expand trade.

SRI LANKANS CALM IN SPITE OF SLAYING

Many Ignore the President's Assassination and Other Recent Civil Strife

By EDWARD A. GARGAN
Special to The New York Times

COLOMBO, Sri Lanka, May 8 — A week after President Ranasinghe Premadasa was assassinated by a suicide bomber, there was little to suggest here that Sri Lanka had suffered a human or political trauma of national dimensions.

Within 24 hours of the President's cremation, at a solemn and elaborate Buddhist ceremony, this city's streets were filled with swarms of bicycle riders, people watching colorful puppet shows, and couples strolling hand in hand along the sea front, in what seemed to be a determined effort to ignore the violence of recent weeks and recapture the lost celebrations of the annual Buddhist holiday, Vesak.

"On the one hand, we've really become immune to violence and brutal death," said Sunila Abeyesekera, who works for Inform, a local human rights group. "People have developed an ability to distance themselves from horror. On the other hand, the jubilation on the day the President's death was announced really shocked and horrified quite a few of us, particularly in a Buddhist country."

While much of the violence that has torn this island has been instigated by secessionist Tamil rebels, many people here also blamed Mr. Premadasa for contributing to the climate of political fear. One Sri Lankan journalist who left the country three years ago, when he was threatened for criticizing the President, returned only this week. "It's safer now," he said.

New Leader Sworn In

Sri Lanka's new President, Dingiri Banda Wijetunga, a man known for his deference to Mr. Premadasa, was elected unanimously by Parliament and sworn in on Friday. In his address to Parliament, he pointed to the violence that many people here believe has insinuated itself into the very marrow of this society.

"Arbitrariness," said Mr. Wijetunga, "indiscretion, violence and uncharacteristic intolerance have begun to raise their ugly head, victimizing outstanding men and women who are the glory of our motherland."

But violence on this island of deep jungles, small towns and endless beaches has not come only recently. For more than a decade a vicious civil war has been waged by Tamil secessionist guerrillas in the country's north and east. The guerrillas, the Liberation Tigers of Tamil Eelam, have pinned down most of the country's army with skilled and savage tactics, while regularly striking with suicide bombers in the heart of the capital as well.

Mr. Premadasa, the police have said, was killed by a Tiger suicide bomber.

And in 1988 and 1989, a violent insurgency by a shadowy Sinhalese nationalist group, the People's Liberation Army, was crushed by Mr. Premadasa in a wave of torture, death and disappearances that was led by the army and Government death squads. In less than two years, as many as 50,000 people died.

Premadasa Foe Killed

Even electoral politics have been marred by violence. The assassination of Mr. Premadasa's most outspoken political opponent, Lalith Athulathmudali, just one week before the President's own death, was perceived by the majority here as the work of the President, although there is no conclusive evidence to support that allegation.

But several senior diplomats here, both Asian and Western, believe that the Government has mishandled the investigation into Mr. Athulathmudali's death, and at least one diplomat used the word "coverup" to describe the investigation. Several key witnesses to his death have not been questioned, and the police identified a man whose body they found as the killer, although witnesses to the shooting say he was not.

Within a week, Sri Lanka will see if it can practice electoral politics in an atmosphere free of violence. On May 17, voters are to elect members of seven provincial councils, the country's district governments. Although there are no opinion polls, many people here have said that if the elections are fair, they will be a referendum on Mr. Premadasa's party and the nature of his rule.

"There is a personalized anger toward the President as the one who was responsible for a great many deaths that took place during his regime," Ms. Abeyesekera said.

'Heading Toward Democracy'

A leading member of the opposition, Gamini Dissanayake, campaigned for his party, the Democratic United National Party, on the day Mr. Premadasa's body was cremated.

"Sri Lanka," he said, "is going, in its own delightfully anarchic way, to find itself. People are saying we want to be free. Sri Lanka is heading toward democracy. What people are asking is: 'Please let our families lead a peaceful life.'"

Government officials dismiss such talk as the predictable response of the opposition. Ranil Wickremesinghe, who was named Prime Minister on Friday, said he believed that the governing United National Party would retain control of the councils. "I am confident we will do well," said Mr. Wickremesinghe, in an interview hours before taking office. The party "is not in disarray" he said. "It's a question of new leadership taking the party forward. We've had far worse situations than this."

An Asian diplomat commented: "This election will be the first test. The system may rise or fall on whether this can be done peacefully and honestly."

Otto Pohl for The New York Times

The German Government is trying to draw ethnic Germans to a settlement near the village of Bezymyannoye, Russia, by building houses, a factory, a school and a clinic. The idea is to counter the allure of emigration to Germany. Vladimir P. Ogarinkov worked on the new houses.

Germany Trying to Keep Ethnic Germans in Russia

Union disintegrated, she was spat upon and called names by Kazakh children.

"The Kazakhs more and more considered themselves the masters there," she said. So with her husband, a Ukrainian, she moved to this military-owned collective farm, Military Sovkhoz No. 23, 30 miles southeast of Saratov, past the town of Engels and the tiny village of Bezymyannoye, or Nameless, and then down a cratered country road.

The German Government is trying to draw ethnic Germans here by building houses, a bakery and sausage factory, a school and clinic, and offering a course in rural construction. The idea is to counter the allure of emigration to Germany, a nation overwhelmed by asylum seekers and the costs of reunification.

But of the 700 or so ethnic Germans who dominate this farm of 1,000 people, 80 percent have already filled out their applications to emigrate, if only as a safety hatch in a region that resents the special benefits ethnic Germans are getting.

A Treeless Plain Deep in Mud

The reality here is an almost treeless plain that becomes boot-swallowing mud in the spring and fall and bakes under 100-degree temperatures in the summer. The sovkhoz of 47,000 acres is called Burny, or Stormy, appropriately for the ethnic Germans, whose lives have been as storm-tossed as any in the former Soviet Union.

Asked if the place matched her parents' descriptions, Mrs. Zarya laughed, a bit bitterly. "It wasn't such a 'bardak' when my parents lived here," she said, using slang for a complete mess. "When we came we were surprised there were no trees. And they said, 'Why plant trees? We'd rather have a bottle of vodka.'"

Germans work better than Russians, she said, echoing a common theme even among Russians themselves. It is the reason Germans were invited to Russia in the first place. Mostly Mennonites and Roman Catholics, they lived in largely self-contained communities; in 1924, the Bolsheviks established the autonomous Volga German Republic over some 11,000 square miles.

The agreement signed in July 1992 by President Boris N. Yeltsin of Russia and the Chancellor of Germany, Helmut Kohl, aims to recreate the republic with German aid. But there has been considerable resistance here, where the homes and lands of the deported Germans were taken over by Russians when Stalin dissolved the republic in the 1940's. Now, on the old territory of the Volga Republic, there are only about 30,000 Germans amid 3 million Russians.

"The tension comes partly from memories of the war, partly exaggerated fear and partly the anti-Western turn in opinion," said Sergei Y. Grishin, editor of Saratovskiye Vesti, a local newspaper. "There are a lot of old slogans, like, 'Better a dry crust of Russian bread than a juicy piece of German meat.'" Among conservative politicians, he said, "there is strong opposition to autonomy, and people's fears are easy to manipulate."

Nikolai S. Makarevich, chairman of the provincial council, said that more than 85 percent of the people in the region opposed autonomy. "It puts the Russian Germans in a delicate position," he said. "But the law is too rough an instrument to solve these ethnic questions. A lot has changed in the last 50 years, and there was also the war, and we can't ignore it. It's better just to learn to live together."

Up to 5 Million Eligible to Emigrate

Officially, there are two million people designated "German" on their passports throughout the former Soviet Union, nearly half of them in Kazakhstan. But given intermarriage and previous discrimination, when it was better to be Russian than German, as many as 5 million may qualify to emigrate, says Heinrich Groth, director of Wiedergeburt, or Rebirth, which represents the ethnic Germans.

The New York Times

Some ethnic Germans are returning to the former Volga Republic.

The German Constitution recognizes nationality by blood and birth, and in Germany like Israel, there is a "law of return." Under the War-Related Compensation Act, 225,000 Germans from Eastern Europe and the Soviet Union may come to Germany each year, Horst Waffenschmidt, State Secretary of the German Interior Ministry, said in a telephone interview.

In 1992, nearly 196,000 emigrated to Germany from the former Soviet Union; about 147,000 came in both 1990 and 1991.

But 557,000 had applied to emigrate in 1991 and 402,000 more in 1992, and Mr. Waffenschmidt said that about 650,000 applications were pending. About 100,000 Germans have received permission to emigrate but have not yet done so, he said, "and some never will."

That suits Bonn nicely. It is already trying to cope with absorbing East Germany and with increased political resentment over immigration, including well-publicized attacks on Turks and Vietnamese. Most of the former Soviet Germans need sustained, expensive help to resettle and find jobs while many East Germans themselves have none.

Germany's policy is clear, if optimistic. The Interior Ministry is providing increasing sums to try to better the lives of ethnic Germans where they already live, to try to dissuade them from coming to Germany, where they are not really wanted.

In the last three years, Germany has spent about $240 million in predominantly German areas of the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe on housing, cultural centers, factories, bakeries and the like. For 1993 alone, about $155 million has been set aside, subject to parliamentary approval.

Most Want To Go to Germany

But the vast majority of the ethnic Germans now scattered on the territory of the former Soviet Union — up to 90 percent, according to Mr. Groth — want to emigrate. A German diplomat in Kazakhstan whose job is to try to keep them from leaving said: "They don't want to create a better future here. They want to pack."

Last year, about 150,000 of Kazakhstan's Germans left, though some, like Mrs. Zarya, came here or to other "magnet" areas where Germany is concentrating aid, like Omsk and Altai, in Siberia, and southern Ukraine, where Germans also lived before the war.

"They're leaving fast," said Seytkazy B. Matayev, a spokesman for Kazakhstan's President, Nursultan A. Nazarbayev. "We're very sorry to lose them; they taught many Kazakhs how to work."

Mr. Groth says magnet communities will fail. "I don't see these projects nearly as positively as the German Government would claim," he said. "They can't really change the situation, with their orderly construction of some schools, factories and housing. This can only weaken for a brief moment people's desire to go to Germany."

Even in Altai, he said, where there are some 18,000 Germans now, 3,200 left last year for Germany. "What kind of future can it have?" he asked.

Erna Miller, 79, her face deeply furrowed around a sunken mouth, sat in her daughter's living room in Burny reading from a German Bible brought from Kazakhstan two years ago. She came with her ailing husband, who wanted to be buried near his birthplace; he died six months ago.

They were deported to Kazakhstan in 1941 and lived with another family in a barn with geese and pigs. Evicted, they moved to the mountains, where her 7-year-old son starved to death. "It could be a whole book," she says now. "But I'm forgetting it all."

When they returned here, they hoped for the re-establishment of the Volga Republic; now, she hopes to go to Germany. "I'm going to die soon," she said, "and I'd rather it be on German soil."

Exacting Customers For New Homes

At Burny, on the relentless plain, local workmen under contract to a German company, Inkoplan, are building houses for the new residents from Central Asia. With pitched roofs, stucco walls and a garage, the two-family houses are an intentional contrast to the decrepit Soviet apartment blocks built 10 years ago when the collective farm was founded.

Russian workmen say the Germans are exacting customers, rejecting poor materials. "Before, we'd just use it," a carpenter said. "But with bent lumber, you can't build straight."

A half-dozen houses are finished; there is money for 58 more. A new bakery is turning out 1,000 loaves a day for about 4 cents a loaf; a new sausage factory uses sovkhoz meat. There are plans for a new school, cultural center and health clinic.

As important, Heinz-Jörg Wobst, a Russian-speaking engineer and former East German Army officer from Saxony, has been here since October with a team of 12 to organize a two-year course in rural construction. The program began on March 1 with 23 students, 13 of them ethnic German. Twenty-five more will start in September, including five young women.

If No Magnet, 'They'll All Leave'

Though the classes are approved by the military, Mr. Wobst operates independently. The whole settlement is so controversial that the sovkhoz director has been ordered by the military not to speak to the press. "We have to build a magnet for Germans," Mr. Wobst said. "Otherwise they'll all leave."

Why won't they take their new skills and go to Germany? "Some will think that way," Mr. Wobst said. "But the students are enthusiastic, and if they feel they're building something that will last, it's not futile, and it benefits everyone."

Graduates will get Russian diplomas with a German seal, and not the German diplomas that might enable them to get construction work in Germany.

When he proposed the project to the Interior Ministry, Mr. Wobst and his team were without work in a unified Germany. He tells the ethnic Germans that life is not perfect there. "They hang on every word," he said. "I say East Germans are second-class citizens and Russian Germans would be third-class. They listen, but don't believe it."

Mrs. Zarya now works for the Germans as their cook and housekeeper. As she makes a stew in the kitchen, a German song is playing on a cassette; "You're going to come home, I know you will. I know it in my heart." Her sister and niece are waiting to leave for Germany; another sister and her brother have applied to go.

She sighs. "My niece dreams of it, but my daughter wants to stay, and my husband," she said. "Someone has to live and work here, too. Nothing comes without work."

Asked if his project will succeed in keeping Germans down on the farm, Mr. Wobst turned out of the wind and said, "It has to."

De Klerk Warns White Extremists

CAPE TOWN, South Africa, May 8 (Reuters) — President F. W. de Klerk told white extremists today that they were playing with fire, and he echoed a warning by Nelson Mandela's African National Congress that right-wing mobilization could turn South Africa into a new Bosnia.

"Extremists on the left or the right should not underestimate the Government's power and its resources," Mr. de Klerk said in a three-page statement released in Cape Town. Both Mr. de Klerk and the African National Congress reacted to veiled warnings of armed resistance to political reform from right-wingers led by four retired white generals.

About 20 extremist groups met near Pretoria Friday to form an Afrikaner People's Front and called for the immediate suspension of multiparty talks on a transition from white rule to democracy.

"The extremist right-wing pressure groups are playing with fire and violations of the law by their side will be dealt with just as strictly as violations by left-wing extremists," Mr. de Klerk said in response to their mobilization.

"The Government will not bow to pressure from the right. Those who imagine that negotiations and a new, just dispensation can be stopped are naive."

Mr. de Klerk also condemned riots by black students linked to a campaign against final-year examination fees, saying, "There will be no concessions in the face of the present pressure."

"Violence would increase and a bloody Bosnia-like civil war could ensue" if the Government gave in to the demands of extremists on the left or the right, he said.

The African National Congress said in a statement that the people of South Africa would not be "blackmailed into accepting schemes that seek to turn South Africa into another Bosnia. South Africa has suffered enough violence and bloodshed."

The police said today that Clive Derby-Lewis, a former Conservative Party member of Parliament, had been charged with the April 10 assassination of Communist Party leader Chris Hani.

He is to appear in court on Wednesday with his wife, Gaye, and Janusz Walus, a Polish immigrant, who already are charged with in the killing. Mr. Hani's death triggered widespread violence.

In Johannesburg, about 6,000 members of the Inkatha Freedom Party, most of whose members are Zulus, marched with spears, axes and shields to the offices of the state-run television and radio service to protest a perceived anti-Inkatha bias.

Vitus Mvelase, a member of Inkatha's central committee, called for an urgent meeting between Mr. Mandela and Inkatha President Mangosuthu Buthelezi to halt violence that has killed about 8,000 people in four years.

Clinton Is Reversing Policies at U.N. on Rights

human rights activities. The two Republican Presidents had argued that establishing such an office would add to the United Nations' bureaucracy.

The proposal put forward by the United States on Thursday would designate a United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights to oversee the implementation of decisions of all United Nations human rights bodies, assume responsibility for human rights issues related to peacekeeping and relief aid and have the authority to send special envoys to investigate allegations of human rights violations.

The commissioner would also have the power to bring to the attention of the Security Council allegations of gross human rights abuses.

The United States document also called on the United Nations to spend more money on human rights activities. The United Nations currently spends about $11 million annually — about 1 percent of its total budget — on human rights efforts.

Some American diplomats hope that the United Nations will increase spending in this area to about 5 percent of its total budget. These officials say they hope to reach that level by shifting funds that are already in the budget, not by asking governments to contribute more.

The document strongly emphasizes the rights of women. It recommends the appointment of a special envoy to investigate instances of violence against women, including "battering in the family, rape, female infanticide, honor killings and dowry murder."

But some women's groups criticized the United States proposal for failing to mention "reproductive rights," a phrase by which they usually mean women's access to family planning services, including abortion. Some also want the United States to support the idea that fear of persecution because of sex could be a basis for granting political asylum.

In March, the Clinton Administration also reversed previous United States policy when it supported a resolution expressing "deep concern" over human rights abuses in East Timor, the former Portuguese colony that was invaded by Indonesia and then annexed. Last year, a similar, though more strongly worded, resolution was blocked by the United States, Australia and Japan.

In another area of concern among human rights advocates and some members of Congress, Mr. Clinton has yet to say whether his Administration will seek to renew China's favorable trade status without conditions.

Christopher Patten, the Governor of Hong Kong, said after meetings with United States officials this week that he expected human rights conditions to be attached to the renewal of China's trade status.

State Department officials say the Administration will probably push for Congressional acceptance of four treaties that the United States signed under President Carter, but were never officially approved. The treaties are the International Covenant on Economic, Social and Cultural Rights, the Inter-American Human Rights Declaration, and two accords that ban discrimination based on race and gender.

Officials of human rights groups say they are being taken more seriously by this Administration than by its Republican predecessors.

"There is clearly a signal that has been given at the highest levels of the Administration to get the word out that the nongovernmental human rights organizations are welcome back," said James O'Dea, director of the Washington office of Amnesty International.

"What I note now is that the access is higher and the meetings aren't pro forma," Mr. O'Dea said, comparing the Clinton Administration with the Reagan and Bush Administrations. "It isn't just window dressing."

Some critics note, however, that an emphasis on human rights was also a cornerstone of the foreign policy of Mr. Carter and that he was forced to turn a blind eye to abuses in some countries when not to have done so would have meant a clash with United States strategic interests.

Warmth, and Relief, Greet Bushes' Return to Maine

Special to The New York Times

KENNEBUNKPORT, Me., May 7 — A greeting in pink chalk appeared today on the daily menu board next to the "Help Wanted" sign at the Old Salt's Pantry on Dock Square, "Welcome Home, Mr. and Mrs. Bush."

A couple of blocks away 900 townspeople assembled on the Village Green to cheer the return of this seaside community's most famous summer residents.

The Kennebunk High School band tooted lustily, a couple of Boy Scouts alternated standing on each other's backs to find a better view and someone in the crowd held up a sign reading, "We Want a Recount."

The Bushes of Walker's Point are back for the summer, and just about everybody is looking forward to a less hectic pace than that of the last four years, when the town was crawling with sightseers, Secret Service agents, foreign leaders and news media crews. Addressing the crowd, Mr. Bush said he hoped that the community's life would be "a little calmer, a little quieter, a little gentler" now that he is just a private citizen.

He assured local fishermen that they would no longer be inconvenienced by his presence. "Come on in," he said. "The water's fine in the bay there."

In the last four years, a Coast Guard cutter patrolled off Walker's Point, clearing the area whenever the President was in town.

Except for one year in World War II, when he was a Navy fighter pilot in the Pacific, Mr. Bush has spent part of every summer at the family vacation home here since he was a boy. Mr. and Mrs. Bush are expected to stay here until the fall.

Gary Gutsinger for The New York Times

Former President George Bush, surrounded by Secret Service agents, greeting crowd in Kennebunkport, Me. He and his wife, Barbara, received a warm welcome as they returned for the summer.

Third in State, First in Town

"George and I are really thrilled to be home among friends," Barbara Bush told the crowd.

It was a somewhat bittersweet affair, considering that Mr. Bush came in third, behind Bill Clinton and Ross Perot, in the Maine Presidential vote. He won in Kennebunkport, however, with about 50 percent of the vote.

Although the homecoming was arranged by a loose-knit group of Republicans calling themselves the Friends of George and Barbara Bush, the party was more parochial than political.

There were neighborly jokes and gag gifts. Gov. John R. McKernan, a frequent guest at Walker's Point, presented Mrs. Bush with Maine license plates and a set of state driving regulations. Olympia J. Snowe, the Republican Congresswoman and wife of the Governor, held up a sign reading, "Beware, New Driver in Town!"

Kenneth Raynor, a local golf pro and Mr. Bush's frequent golfing partner, handed the former President a combination putter and fishing pole with a horseshoe attached, representing three of Mr. Bush's enthusiasms.

Parking Sticker No. 1

Town Manager Jane Duncan announced that the Bushes would be assigned the No. 1 residential parking sticker for the municipal Goose Rocks Beach, "and that officially makes you residents, not people from away."

Residents expect to see more of the Bushes now that they are no longer subject to high-powered security. In the past, a simple trip into town might have involved a motorcade of 10 to 15 vehicles, police blockades of side streets and a phalanx of Secret Service agents surrounded by reporters and photographers.

Since Mr. Bush's return here last Sunday security has been considerably less visible than before. He has been able to venture out several times, more or less unobtrusively, if not exactly unnoticed. Despite charges that Iraqi agents had sought to kill Mr. Bush during his visit to Kuwait three weeks ago, security has not visibly increased.

On Monday, Mr. Bush went to Bowdoin College in Brunswick, 50 miles north of here, for a lacrosse match. He sat quietly in the bleachers with his brother Jonathan, whose son Billy played attack for visiting Colby College.

On Thursday, Mr. Bush and a small entourage shopped for household items at a Wal-Mart. He greeted customers and employees who spotted him as he was escorted through the store, but he otherwise created little disturbance.

Mr. Bush is deliberately keeping his distance from the press. At the homecoming he told reporters in the crowd, "I'm out of the interview business."

He also said he would avoid politics for the foreseeable future, although he expressed interest in becoming involved in unspecified civic affairs. "We want to be good citizens of Kennebunkport," he said.

Shopkeepers expressed confidence that the end of the Bush Presidency would not mean a significant decline in the local economy. Cynthia Chadwick, who manages a clothing and jewelry shop just off Dock Square, said there was a difference between Presidential sightseers and regular tourists. Those looking for Presidential sites tend to move through quickly, she said, and tourists, attracted to the town in its own right, are inclined to linger and patronize the stores and restaurants.

The community has a year-round population of 3,500 that multiplies to 25,000 in the summer.

Florida Trial Odyssey Ends For an Officer in 2 Killings

By LARRY ROHTER
Special to The New York Times

MIAMI, May 8 — After being shifted five times from one city to another, the racially charged retrial of a Miami police officer on charges of killing two young black men is scheduled to begin on Monday in Orlando.

The case of William Lozano has preoccupied Florida for more than four years, and Judge W. Thomas Spencer of Dade County Circuit Court has been stymied in his effort to hold the trial in a city where blacks are likely to be on the jury. Orlando, where the second trial of Mr. Lozano has settled, is conservative, overwhelmingly white and none too happy to be saddled with what the rest of Florida views as Miami's problem.

Selection of a six-member jury is expected to consume about a week, with opening statements probably taking place in mid-May. Mr. Lozano admits firing the shot that led to the deaths of the two men in early 1989, but says he acted in self-defense.

The deaths of the two men, a motorcyclist and his passenger, touched off three days of racial rioting in the city.

In his first trial, Mr. Lozano was convicted on two counts of manslaughter, but an appeals court overturned the verdict, saying the jurors might have been influenced by fears of further racial violence.

Public officials and leaders of citizens' groups have warned that the retrial has so many echoes of the Rodney G. King case in Los Angeles that more racial unrest could be ignited if Mr. Lozano is acquitted.

Leaders of black civic groups have been especially critical of the decision to move the case from racially and ethnically diverse Miami to Orlando, which some call "the Simi Valley of Florida," in reference to the overwhelmingly white Southern California community where a state jury acquitted four Los Angeles police officers in the beating of Mr. King.

A Janet Reno Case

Mr. Lozano's new trial, which is to be televised, will offer a glimpse at the prosecutorial skills of Attorney General Janet Reno, who was State Attorney here for 15 years and oversaw the case until she left for Washington. Ms. Reno's office had a history of being reluctant to prosecute police officers involved in brutality cases.

As in the first trial, Mr. Lozano's defense will be led by Roy Black, who came to national attention in 1991 when he defended William K. Smith in a widely publicized Palm Beach rape case. Mr. Smith was acquitted.

The Lozano case began Jan. 16, 1989, when the 33-year-old Hispanic police officer fired a single shot from his Glock pistol at a motorcyclist who was being chased through the predominantly black Overtown section of Miami by another officer. The cyclist, 23-year-old Clement A. Lloyd, died of a head wound; his passenger, Allan Blanchard, died the next day of injuries he received when the motorcycle crashed.

Even as police officers were investigating the shooting, rioting erupted in predominantly black areas of Miami. Over the next three nights, arson, gunfire and looting resulted in one death, hundreds of injuries and arrests and millions of dollars in damage.

Symbolic of Tensions

In addition, the case quickly became a symbol of long-standing tensions between Hispanic residents, who dominate politics and business in Dade County, and blacks, who constitute about 20 percent of the county's population. Mr. Lozano, who was born in Bogotá, Colombia, immigrated to the United States at age 12 with his family. He became a police officer in 1985 and has three brothers who are policemen.

In December 1989 a jury of three whites, two blacks and one Hispanic member convicted Mr. Lozano of two counts of manslaughter. He was sentenced to seven years in prison and dismissed from the police force. In his appeal, he argued that he had not received a fair trial because jurors were afraid of rioting if they acquitted him.

Florida's Third District Court of Appeals ruled in June 1991 that Mr. Lozano's original request for a change of venue should have been granted and that he was therefore entitled to a new trial outside Miami.

Since Mr. Lozano's first trial, there have been numerous incidents of racial conflict around the country, most notably after the four officers' acquittal on state charges in the King case last year. (Two of the Los Angeles officers were convicted on Federal charges in the King case last month.) With that example in mind, elected officials and civic leaders throughout Florida have strenuously sought to prevent the case from being shifted to their jurisdictions.

In a matter of a few months last year, the case was moved from Miami to Orlando to Tallahassee, then back to Orlando and back to Tallahassee again, with the primary reason being concern over the possible racial composition of the jury. After efforts to move the case back to Miami were rejected late last month, Orlando was finally designated as the trial site.

Last May, Judge Spencer cited the King case when he countermanded his initial decision to move the case to Orlando and instead selected Tallahassee. "That so many of our fellow Americans feel shut out from our judicial system demands our attention," Judge Spencer wrote. He also vowed that "this court will insure that blacks will be on the jury that tries this case to the extent the law permits."

> An unhappy site for a racially charged trial.

Precautions With Jurors

Though Mr. Lozano's lawyers, joined by prosecutors, were able in March to persuade an appeals court to overrule Judge Spencer and move the trial out of Tallahassee, Mr. Lozano appears to remain concerned. In an appearance on a Spanish-language radio station last year, part of his continuing effort to raise money for a defense that he says has bankrupted him, he suggested that the Los Angeles riots had made it impossible for him to get a fair trial in Florida.

"Anybody in the jury will be thinking that if they absolve me, there will be burning and disturbances and millions of dollars lost," he said.

Black officials and civic leaders have been even more critical, pointing out that the percentage of blacks in the jury pool in Orlando is only half that of Miami or Tallahassee.

To reduce the possibility that jurors might be swayed by concerns about racial violence, Judge Spencer has ordered that the identities of jurors not be released until six months after the trial. The judge has also said that jury selection will not be televised and that jurors "will not be photographed or televised during any part of the trial."

Lawyers for both sides have declined to say what new arguments or evidence, if any, they will present in the retrial. Mr. Lozano testified at his first trial and is expected to do so again.

Ex-Postal Employee Is Arrested in Deaths Of Two in California

DANA POINT, Calif., May 8 (AP) — A former postal worker suspected of killing his mother and a mail carrier was captured today by police officers who received a call that he was drinking at a bar.

The dismissed postal worker, Mark R. Hilbun, was arrested in Huntington Beach, about 20 miles northwest of Dana Point, where, the police say, he opened fire in a post office on Thursday.

"They didn't even approach this guy with their guns drawn," Frank McNaughton, general manager of the bar, said of four officers who made the arrest. "They asked him to step outside. He was real complacent."

Mr. Hilbun, who, the police say, had been stalking a mail carrier, is suspected of stabbing his mother on Thursday before fatally shooting a postal employee and wounding three others.

Mr. McNaughton said that a customer recognized Mr. Hilbun, 38, who was watching sports on a television set and having a drink, and that a friend of the customer called the police.

Dismissed for Stalking

Lieut. Charles Poe of the police in Huntington Beach said Mr. Hilbun, who earlier had a mustache, was clean shaven, and his hair had been cut.

Mr. Hilbun was a carrier at the post office until last year, when he was dismissed for stalking a co-worker.

Lieut. Bob Rivas of the Orange County Sheriff's Department said the police believed that before his arrest Mr. Hilbun had robbed and shot two people at an automated teller machine in nearby Fountain Valley. The victims, Jim Brown, 44, and Elizabeth Shea, 28, who were not seriously injured, told the police that a man matching Mr. Hilbun's description demanded Mr. Brown's wallet and shot them just after midnight.

The post office here reopened Friday with 12 armed guards, but there was no home delivery. Residents picked up their mail at the office. About half of the 65 employees scheduled to work stayed home. Carriers returned to their routes today.

The attack on Thursday occurred within hours of a shooting at a post office in Dearborn, Mich., in which a postal mechanic, Larry Jasion, killed a co-worker and wounded two others before fatally shooting himself.

Without Long-Term Care, Health Care Reform Will Miss Millions Of People Who Need It Most.

Long-term care is a critically important issue. And not just for older people.

It's an issue for chronically ill or disabled children. For working people forced to quit their jobs to care for a spouse or relative. For families who must drain their life savings in order to qualify for Medicaid.

It's an issue for the seven million Americans—half of whom are under age 65—whose families are being financially and emotionally devastated.

That's why AARP urges everyone to call or write the President and your Congressional representatives. Tell them that health care reform must include long-term care coverage for people of all ages.

Confidence in President Clinton Is Eroding Among Many Business Leaders form — which could involve a new payroll tax — could end up heaping heavy new costs on business.

Mood Affects Recovery

That these executives are far more worried than they were a couple of months ago is not just a political problem. Confidence is a necessary ingredient in business decisions to invest in technology, hire workers or start new ventures, so the bleaker mood is bad for an economy that is already on a slow-growth path.

"When you have conditions like this, what everybody does is clam up," said Mr. Gault of Goodyear. "They pull back on spending, they don't hire people, it's wait and see. You're seeing it reflected in the data already."

Mitchell S. Fromstein, chairman and chief executive of Manpower Inc., the nation's largest supplier of temporary help, said: "The process of job formation has a lot of psychology in it. We sense an increasing amount of uncertainty."

And F. Kenneth Iverson, chairman and chief executive of the Nucor Corporation, a steel producer in Charlotte, N.C., said flatly, "Everybody's sitting on his hands because nobody knows what's going to happen."

In addition to the top executives interviewed last week, a monthly survey by Cahners Economics of 400 manufacturing executives found that since February, business confidence has slipped, giving back more than two-thirds of its earlier rise. Earlier surveys found that the business mood started to improve after the election; jumped in December, the month of the economic summit meeting in Little Rock, Ark., and peaked in February, the month President Clinton announced his economic plans to Congress.

"The mood is very bad. I still don't think we're going to break the recovery, I tell you it's very scary."

That survey supports the observation of several executives that business approval of Mr. Clinton eroded as more details of his economic plans emerged, and also slipped with the defeat of his economic stimulus package in Congress.

The business executives are not alone. A Times-Mirror poll released on Friday by the Times-Mirror Center for the People and the Press found that the President's approval rating had dropped to 12 percent from 25 percent in February among people who voted for President Bush in November, 21 percent from 29 percent among Republicans, and 45 percent from 58 percent among people with family incomes of more than $50,000. The poll carried a margin of sampling error of plus or minus three percentage points for results based on all respondents.

Failing Marks as Manager

As much as the specifics of the Clinton economic plan, it is the President's performance as a manager that has many corporate leaders gritting their teeth.

"It's the disarray," said Jerry Jasinowski, president of the National Association of Manufacturers. "These guys can stand a lot of stuff, but they can't stand confusion and chaos. They see this big enterprise called the Federal Government, and they say to themselves, 'Jesus Christ, there's nobody really managing this.'"

And John B. McCoy Jr., chairman and chief executive of Banc One, the nation's eighth largest bank, said: "There was sort of a high when Clinton got elected. Everybody said, 'Let's go.' Now we have 87 agenda items and we're not getting anything."

Grievances include too many taxes, not enough budget cuts.

Yet if the chorus of disappointment is swelling, not every executive goes along.

"My confidence hasn't deteriorated," said Jerry K. Pearlman, chairman, president and chief executive of the Zenith Electronics Corporation. He said that when he hears business people complain about President Clinton, he asks: "Do you like where your interest rates are today? Do you like the billions you're saving in corporate debt payments?"

And Don L. Gevirtz, chairman and chief executive of the Foothill Group, a Los Angeles-based venture capital firm and a major fundraiser for the Mondale, Dukakis and Clinton campaigns in California, said: "I don't sense a wave of pessimism. People keep buying stocks."

But even these gung-ho defenders of Mr. Clinton's first 100 days have some complaints.

Mr. Pearlman, for example, said: "Right now, we've seen the policies. We haven't seen effective implementation." And Mr. Gevirtz observed, "Their lack of focus lost them the opporunity to turn around the California economy."

"The mood is very bad," said George Hatsopoulos, an active Democrat and the chief executive of the Thermo Electron Corporation, a company in Waltham, Mass., that makes instruments and pollution control equipment. "I still don't think we're going to break the recovery, I tell you it's very scary."

Mr. Hatsopoulos is one of the "high-technology Democrats" who felt that the Clinton victory in November contributed to a revival of the nation's economic confidence.

Tax-and-Spend Mix Derided

Three things seem to be bothering most executives.

First, many dislike the mix of taxes and spending in the Clinton budget. To hear executives tell it, many were initially impressed by the President's commitment to cut the deficit. But as the details of the budget emerged, there were more taxes and fewer spending cuts than many had hoped for. The executives worry that new spending will derail deficit reduction and and that higher taxes will stifle economic growth.

"Most individuals are ready to pay more taxes if the money is going toward deficit reduction," said Mr. Gault at Goodyear. "If you're going to take the money and dissipate it, they won't be interested."

Ted Van Dyck, a Washington political consultant with close ties to Democrats in the business community, said of President Clinton: "He misread his mandate and essentially overweighted the taxes and spending side in his basic package. It's already the largest tax increase in history. Combining it with health care reform could cripple the economy."

A second concern of many executives is that the Administration will try to solve problems on the back of the business community.

"The label of New Democrat got put on the President when he ran, but the business community doesn't see much difference between this Democrat and the prior Democrat," said Mr. Shapiro, the retired Du Pont chairman.

And Mr. Della Femina commented: "Every business person I know has the same look that King Kong had at the top of the Empire State Building when the helicopters started shooting. They are stunned."

The third factor on many executives' complaint list is their qualms about Mr. Clinton's management.

"What I hear," said Mr. Pearlman of Zenith, "is why are so many jobs still unfilled so that nothing's happening, and why are they doing so many things at one time?"

Paul Tsongas, the former Senator from Massachusetts who ran against Mr. Clinton in the Democratic primaries and who sits on eight corporate boards, commented, "A lot of it is the question about focus."

Part of the concern about Mr. Clinton's management is that the Presidential team has too few experienced hands on it. "We have a building full of Rhodes scholars who love their current position but don't have any practical experience," Mr. Shapiro said. That's showing."

How to Woo Business Back

Most executives interviewed said they thought President Clinton could win back the disaffected business community, and they are not shy about telling him how.

The Democrats "need some wins in Congress," Mr. Pearlman said, adding, "They have to pick a few things to get done, run them all the way through."

Mr. Shapiro said, "There's a great question of credibility on whether they are really cutting spending. The public can't put its finger on anything. To get credibility, the White House has to do something major, like get rid of an agency and pick up a lot of money in a hurry."

And Mr. Tsongas insisted: "There is still a consensus that if he does well, we do well. I don't detect any disrespect for Bill Clinton that I used to get about George Bush."

Washington Weighs Revising Slots at Four Major Airports

WASHINGTON, May 8 (Reuters) — The Clinton Administration is considering reopening the question of how to allocate airline access to four of the busiest airports, The Washington Post reported today.

The newspaper quoted an anonymous top official in Transportation Department as saying the department might announce a study of the controlled system at the airports, Washington National, Kennedy International, La Guardia and O'Hare. Deregulation in the 1980's created a "slot" system that allows airlines to buy and sell the limited number of landing and takeoff openings at the airports.

The Administration is also scrutinizing the allocation of international routes, The Post said.

Clinton Works on Welfare Plan

By JANET BATTAILE
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 8 — An interagency group has begun work on President Clinton's campaign pledge to "end welfare as we know it" and hopes to unveil its proposal in the fall, a White House official said today.

The group is considering several basic elements to overhaul the welfare system, said Bruce Reed, a White House domestic policy adviser. They include a proposal to limit a person's stay on welfare, tracking and collecting child-support payments, and ways to make work more attractive than being on welfare — ideas often mentioned by Mr. Clinton himself.

"This is a top priority for the President," Mr. Reed said. "It was a central element of his campaign."

The group's work was reported in Sunday editions of The Washington Post. The Post said the cost of the new program was estimated at $5 billion a year. But it said that $2 billion could be saved each year from reduced demand, leaving a net cost of $3 billion.

In his address to Congress shortly after taking office, Mr. Clinton repeated his pledge to overhaul welfare and asked the nation's governors to appoint a task force to study the issue.

Although they have not yet done so, the Administration has put together an interagency group, consisting of White House aides and people from various agencies, including two Health Department nominees who have to be confirmed by the Senate. They are David T. Ellwood, nominated as Assistant Secretary of Health and Human Services for planning and evaluation, and Mary Jo Bane, Assistant Secretary for children and families.

CITIBANK'S NEW STOCK INDEX INSURED ACCOUNT

Stock market returns. Zero risk to principal.

TRANSFER OR ROLLOVER YOUR IRA OR KEOGH TO CITIBANK'S NEW FDIC INSURED ACCOUNT.

If you want to make the most of your retirement plan, move your IRA or Keogh to Citibank now. Why? Because Citibank's new Stock Index Insured Account gives you the potential for stock market growth, without risk to principal.

EXCLUSIVELY FOR IRAs AND KEOGHS

CITIBANK'S NEW STOCK INDEX INSURED ACCOUNT.

With this unique account, the return on your IRA or Keogh is tied to the Standard & Poor's 500 Index. Yet it's 100% safe. There's no risk of losing your principal...even if the market goes down. Your principal is FDIC insured.

HERE'S HOW IT WORKS.

The Stock Index Insured Account is a five year deposit. The return for this account is calculated by averaging the month-end values of the S&P 500 Index over the term, comparing this average to the Index on the day your account was opened, and doubling the percentage gain. So in a rising market, you enjoy stock growth.

But even in a declining market, your principal is safe.

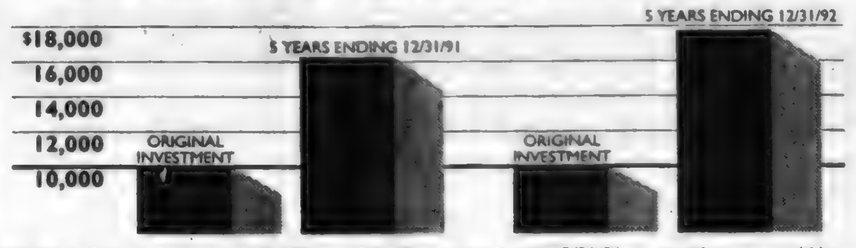
The Stock Index Insured Account is only available at Citibank. It's the perfect way to let your IRA or Keogh money take advantage of long-term market trends.

Because the return is based on stock market movement over a full five years, there are severe principal penalties for early withdrawal.

HERE'S HOW TO START:

For more information, or to rollover or transfer your IRA or Keogh, stop into any Citibank branch today or call 1-800-321-CITI, ext. 7102.

TOTAL RETURN ON FIVE-YEAR DEPOSIT HELD UNTIL MATURITY.



Example A: If you had deposited $10,000 on 12/31/86 and held it until 12/31/91 your total return would be $16,332. (Original investment plus $6,332 interest). Because your return is based on the average of the month-end values of the S&P 500 Index over the five-year term, you would have received a return even though this period included the 1987 market downturn. Example B: If you had deposited $10,000 on 12/31/87 and held it until 12/31/92 your total return would be $17,933 (Original investment plus $7,933 interest).

And unlike investments with a broker or in some mutual funds, there are no management fees or sales charges. And there's no risk to principal. The minimum deposit is only $10,000.

You can call any day of the week, even on weekends.

THE CITI NEVER SLEEPS®

American Voices on Health Care: Even in Security, Anxiety

Interviews by Peter T. Kilborn with Americans in Iowa City and Cedar Rapids and across the Mississippi in Moline, Ill., disclose a growing diversity in health insurance coverage and care arrangements. Here are the stories of five families.

The Coens

Cradled, for Now, By Medicare

Married for 57 years, William and Gertrude Coen talk about their health like a team, with more amusement than complaint.

"His liver enzymes went up," said Mrs. Coen, who is 76.

"Liver hepatitis, they called it," said Mr. Coen, 79.

"He lost about 35 pounds," she said.

"The enzymes are about normal now," he said.

"Gained 9 pounds," she said.

Only with prodding does the cost of Mr. Coen's treatment arise.

"He went to a doctor's office so they could take blood," Mrs. Coen said.

"Then we get a statement from Blue Cross saying how much they paid," Mr. Coen said.

The statement says, "Specimen transportation, $9."

"You got to pay the doctor to take the blood," Mrs. Coen said. "Now they even charge for carrying the blood."

For the Coens, health care is effective and gentle on their finances. Like 99 percent of the population 65 and older, they are covered by Medicare, the Government's health insurance program for the elderly, and they also have private insurance that covers most of what Medicare does not. "For us," Mr. Coen said, "it's O.K. the way it is. I know it's not for a lot of other people."

Mr. Coen worked for the post office for 37 years, the last 13 as Iowa City's postmaster. Mrs. Coen stopped work after their marriage to raise a daughter, now a professor of nursing at the University of Iowa.

They have paid off the mortgage on their compact split-level house in an Iowa City subdivision. They have a pension, Social Security and savings that give them an income of more than $40,000 a year.

Their sole significant out-of-pocket health expenses last year were $1,939 for medicine and $1,828 for insurance for hospitalization costs not covered by Medicare. This year they expect to pay much less for medicine because they have joined a program for Federal workers and retirees that pays 80 percent of the cost of prescriptions.

The Coens, however, wonder about long-term care, which can eat up $30,000 a year or more and is not covered by Medicare. Mr. Coen's mother died at 93 of Alzheimer's disease after seven years in a nursing home. She was indigent by then, having exhausted proceeds from the sale of her four-unit apartment house that was also her home.

But much as they think about long-term care, they said they are not worried enough to submit to the blandishments of salesmen who pitch them insurance to pay for it. It could cost them $1,000 or more a month, and they say the policies are riddled with exclusions. "When you need it most," Mrs. Coen said, "it doesn't do you any good."

Many retirees want the Government to help pay for long-term care, but the Coens say they just have not given much thought to that. "As long as we're able to pay, we should pay," Mrs. Coen said. But rather than hold onto their assets only to lose them all to a nursing home, they have been thinking about giving some to their grandchildren. They would slide into poverty that much sooner, when Medicaid would pay.

The Weirathers

Part-Time Work, Full-Time Worry

One Tuesday night, Maria Weirather and her spirited little girls arrive 40 minutes early for an 8:30 appointment at the Iowa City Free Medical Clinic. The bus they take from their trailer park passes once an hour, and the next would have made them late. The children, Beverly, who is 4, and Andrea, 3, need physical examinations and immunizations, and here, there is no charge.

Ms. Weirather uses the clinic even though she works. Twenty-five years old and divorced, she transcribes researchers' notes in the psychology laboratory at the University of Iowa and cleans the cages of mice, cats and chimpanzees. The job is only 20 to 30 hours a week and ends in late May, when she hopes to get another. She earns $5.50 an hour.

Health insurance does not come with the job, and Ms. Weirather (pronounced WY-rather) cannot afford to buy it herself. She collects $260 a month in child support from her former husband, Mark Weirather, and her grandmother pays for her telephone. But with expenses like the $360-a-month rent for her trailer, she still qualifies for $247 a month in food stamps — "something I'm not very proud of," she said.

Ms. Weirather is 5 feet tall, a compact and vigorous, thoroughly engaged mother who boasts of the strength she has gained from chasing after buses and her kids. She finished high school at 17, married at 20, dropped out of college and had her two children.

She is among 56 percent of the 37 million uninsured Americans under 65 who have jobs, according to the Employment Benefit Research Institute in Washington. And Beverly and Andrea are among another 26 percent of the uninsured who are children. Typically, the wages of working people who lack insurance, however low, are not low enough to allow them access to Medicaid, the Federal-state health program for the poor.

Free clinics are often their principal recourse. The Iowa City clinic's mostly volunteer doctors, nurses and students provide outpatient services only, mostly shots, physicals, treatment of minor illnesses, some lab tests and prescriptions. It refers more serious cases to specialists, some of whom take the patients for free, more of whom charge a fee at the door or request monthly payments.

Ms. Weirather believes she can find a job that would provide health insurance if she can get her bachelor's degree in microbiology, and by taking occasional courses, she has just one semester to go. But she is trapped in trying to work and arrange child care with friends, so making time for college and saving to pay for it seem beyond her grasp.

Once Ms. Weirather's care was simple and automatic. Her former husband had insurance through his job as a mechanic at a Chrysler dealership when, in October 1990, a malignant tumor was found on her left ovary. "I went in, and they said, 'Surgery,' " she said. "Within a week, I had surgery."

After the divorce, Mr. Weirather left his job for another without insurance in Keokuk, Iowa, a two-hour drive southeast of Iowa City. Her eyes welling up, Ms. Weirather said that a year after her operation, doctors spotted another growth on the same ovary. They removed it last October.

Public assistance paid for the operation and her chemotherapy, she said. "But I was left owing $5,000 to the hospital," she said. That is why Ms. Weirather takes the bus.

"I had a 1990 Dodge Spirit turbo," she said. "It was essential transportation." She sold it for $4,000 to pay the bill. "It was the one really nice thing that I had," she said, "and the only new car that I ever owned."

The McLaughlins

Getting the Most From a Union Plan

Amber McLaughlin is an 8-year-old second grader in East Moline, Ill., who has freckles and plays baseball. She has brown eyes and pretty pink frames for glasses with lenses as thick as her thumbs. She called home from school one day this month upset that everything looked blurred again. Her mother, Valerie McLaughlin, promised her yet another pair of glasses.

Whatever Mrs. McLaughlin's anxiety about Amber's vision, the cost of her glasses has never intruded. Nor has the cost of visiting doctors, or the $16,197 for her four eye operations, or even the psychotherapy that Amber, her sister Carrie, 11, and Mrs. McLaughlin have sought to cope with the trauma. The family's sole expense is the $2 it pays for each prescription.

Amber is the beneficiary of her father's employment at Deere & Company, the maker of tractors and agricultural implements, and of the health care arrangements that the company has worked out with the United Automobile Workers. Deere offers unionized workers the choice of three programs, all without deductions from their pay. In the oldest plan, the company pays 100 percent of hospital and surgical charges but only $2 for a visit to a doctor's office.

The newest option, established this year, ties all care to a company medical center in Moline, which the Mayo Clinic of Rochester, Minn., helps run. The clinic provides services the old plan does not, like free physical examinations. But workers must choose one of the center's five family doctors, who are Deere employees, and rely on them for referrals to affiliated specialists and a local hospital or to the Mayo Clinic. They may bypass the center provided they pay 20 percent of the fees, or up to $2,000 for a family per year.

The most popular option and the one the McLaughlins use is the third: a health maintenance organization that Deere established 15 years ago, which has evolved into one of the nation's most comprehensive. Except for the tie to the Mayo Clinic and the convenience of the new center's one-stop service, the H.M.O. provides all the cost-free coverage the center does.

Most doctors around Moline, including more than 50 family doctors, have agreed to negotiated fees to participate in the H.M.O. Workers are free to see whomever they like within the organization. Only when they want to see nonparticipating specialists must they obtain referrals, which any H.M.O. doctor can provide, and the McLaughlins prefer the less restrictive access to specialists.

Mr. McLaughlin, 40, earns $40,000 a year. Mrs. McLaughlin, also 40, gave up a convenience store job six years ago soon after noticing a reddening of Amber's left eye and a swelling of her left knee. Their H.M.O. doctor, a family practitioner, said she had pink eye. And after X-raying the knee, Mrs. McLaughlin said, "he told us: 'I see a little fluid on the knee. We'll keep an eye on it.' "

The problems persisted, she said, so the doctor tried one form of medication and then another. Then, when he was away, she consulted another H.M.O. family doctor, who prescribed the original medication. "That meant to me that he hadn't looked in her file," Mrs. McLaughlin said.

The next day, she brought Amber to an ophthalmologist in the H.M.O. "This doctor told me she had juvenile rheumatoid arthritis," Mrs. McLaughlin said. Mr. McLaughlin added, "He said: 'She is going to be blind. Just accept it.' "

The McLaughlins then learned of a children's ophthalmologist, also in the H.M.O. He removed a cataract and then referred her to the University of Iowa, 70 miles away in Iowa City, for surgery for two more cataracts, a detached retina and glaucoma. The H.M.O. paid the full cost of her care there.

The McLaughlins say they have been told Amber has a 50-50 chance to retain her vision in at least one eye. They will never know if earlier treatment might have raised the odds. But they do know they want the freedom to choose special care the instant their instincts tell them they should.

The O'Connors

Taking a Pay Cut To Get Coverage

The youngest of Debra O'Connor's three boys, 4-year-old Kyle, had a bad cough the night of Wednesday, Jan. 20. The 20 miles of road from her home in Lisbon, Iowa, to Cedar Rapids were icy, so she planned to wait until the morning to decide whether to take him to a hospital. "But it got really, really bad," she said, "so at 2 A.M. I took him in."

Emergency room doctors at St. Luke's Hospital diagnosed croup and viral infection. He spent four days there. Ms. O'Connor showed the hospital's statement from her files: $1,814.19. But her entire cost was $100. "I don't even fill out any medical insurance forms," she said. "For me it's very simple."

Photographs by Stephen Crowley/The New York Times

Iowa City: Although William and Gertrude Coen are covered both by Medicare and private insurance, they are concerned about long-term care, which is not included.

Iowa City: Maria Weirather, who has had ovarian cancer, works, but insurance does not come with her job and she cannot afford to buy it. With her were her daughters.

Moline, Ill.: The health maintenance organization the McLaughlin family uses has given them freedom to choose special care for their daughter Amber's eye problems.

Lisbon, Iowa: Debra O'Connor took a lower-paying job at an aircraft electronics factory to get full insurance benefits for herself and her three sons for $7 a month.

Cedar Rapids, Iowa: Elma and Leo Patten say that other than eating and sleeping right, mall walking is their only cheap answer to preserving their health.

Ms. O'Connor, 30, and her boys live with her parents in an old farm house in Lisbon. She used to manage a pizza parlor where she earned about $22,000 a year. The employer provided her health insurance at no cost. But a family plan covering her sons would have cost $250 a month. "There was no possibility I could afford to do that," she said.

Her mother and her sister had a much cheaper, more comprehensive plan at the aircraft electronics factory in Coralville, Iowa, that is a part of Rockwell International. Rockwell has a preferred provider organization, which negotiates special rates for its employees. So in September 1991, Ms. O'Connor took an assembly job there.

She started at $6 an hour, or about $12,000 a year. With wage increases won through her union, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, she now earns $8.20 an hour, still much less than before. "But I got full insurance benefits for $7 a month," she said. "That was a big deal for me."

Any day now, Ms. O'Connor expects to be making new demands on the health plan. Her oldest son, Adam, 9, rarely needs doctors, but the third, 7-year-old Zachary, has asthma, and a simple bee sting, she said, means a trip to the hospital. "It always triggers an asthma attack," she said.

She has to drive to a pharmacy in Cedar Rapids to have prescriptions filled, but the cost is $3 for generic drugs and $10 for brand-name drugs. Besides the $100 for a stay in the hospital, she pays $25 for outpatient service at the hospital and $10 to see doctors who participate in the preferred provider organization. And so many belong, she said, "it would be pretty hard to find a doctor you would not be happy with."

Still, Ms. O'Connor is skittish. The rise in health care costs is nipping at her insurance plan. Until this year, she said, prescriptions were free. And she cannot be sure of what lies ahead for Rockwell. The plant in Coralville has never laid anyone off, she said. But with the aerospace industry in turmoil, it could any day, and she would again be uninsured.

"You can bet there's fear," she said. She wants the Government to provide health coverage for all, the employed and unemployed. "I'm all for nationalized health care," she said. "If my taxes go up, they go up."

The Pattens

A Life of Work But Little Security

"We mall walk," said Leo Patten, who is 61 and involuntarily retired. Weekday mornings, from 7:30 to 9, Mr. Patten and his wife, Elma, 58, also involuntarily retired, drive to the Westdale Mall near their home in Cedar Rapids and hike three miles, or six laps around the interior.

The Pattens belong to an association of 3,800 Cedar Rapids mall walkers. St. Luke's Hospital there has awarded Mr. Patten two T-shirts for having twice passed the 1,000-mile mark over his seven years of walking. "I'm trying to stay off the oxygen bottle," he said. Mrs. Patten, who started last year, is up to 150 miles.

Other than eating and sleeping right, mall walking is their only cheap answer to preserving what they have of their health, the Pattens say. The health care debate in Washington blows right by them, they say. "The things I'm hearing, it seems we fall in the cracks," Mrs. Patten said. "We're not employed, and we're not destitute." After decades of middle class security, the Pattens fear that another setback will drive them out of their $65,000 white clapboard home and onto the welfare rolls.

The Pattens grew up in Cedar Rapids. For 13 years in the 1950's and 60's they lived near Los Angeles where Mr. Patten worked as a machinist. Concerned that the area's drug problem would reach their four daughters, they returned to Cedar Rapids.

There, Mr. Patten found a machining job with a company that later folded. He moved to another but never worked anywhere long enough to qualify for a pension. Mrs. Patten became a marker at a department store, putting price tags on goods. It folded after she had been there 14 years, and it turned out that the store had spent what was to have been her pension. She then took a similar job at a women's clothing store.

In 1972, Mr. Patten was found to have the first signs of emphysema, and as his lungs deteriorated, he quit work in 1986. "Too many cigarettes and dirty machine shops," he said. "I've got 40 percent lung capacity. My goal is to hold it steady." Although not yet 65, he receives Medicare because he has been disabled for more than two years.

But because of his emphysema, he cannot get supplemental insurance to cover costs that Medicare does not like prescription drugs, prolonged hospital stays and treatment that exceeds the amounts the Government reimburses. "Insurance companies won't talk to him," Mrs. Patten said. "It makes me mad. He takes care of himself."

Nor will they talk to Mrs. Patten. On both wrists, she has the scars of incisions seven years ago to repair nerve damage from the repetitive motions of marking goods. She learned she had diabetes 15 years ago. She had a hysterectomy 13 years ago, double bypass heart surgery three years ago and a mastectomy last July, when doctors told her to stop work.

The department store's insurance covered her care while she worked there, and a Government-subsidized policy covered her for 18 months after it closed. But the clothing store's insurer denied her coverage because of her health history.

In July 1994 Mrs. Patten, too, will reach the two-year threshhold to qualify for Medicare because of her disability. But until then, the only coverage she can find is a plan the State of Iowa offers high-risk people. It would cost $255 a month and would start paying her bills each year only after she had put out $2,000, so her total cost would be $5,060.

Such sums are beyond the Pattens' means. Their savings are down to $2,000. Their income, about $23,500 a year, comes from $1,374 a month in Social Security, disability benefits and $581 a month in disability compensation from Mr. Patten's last employer. That check stops when he turns 65.

"A person keeps their nose to the grindstone, works hard, pays their bills on time," Mrs. Patten said in a letter to Hillary Rodham Clinton. "Then when your health goes bad they kick you into a corner."

politics and movies. "They're highly scripted, poorly directed and always over budget," he said.

Washington and Hollywood have always been drawn to each other because of their common interest in performance and image, and their complementary insecurities: the Hollywood elite wants to be seen as serious, and the Washington elite wants to be seen as glamorous.

But with the technological and talk-show revolution of the last Presidential campaign, politics has taken on even more of the techniques of popular culture and packaged entertainment. The Clinton convention and inauguration were painstakingly produced by Harry Thomason and Linda Bloodworth-Thomason, the Hollywood sitcom czars who have also bought a beach-front estate outside Santa Barbara, Calif., that the Clintons, their longtime friends, can use as a Western retreat.

Ronald and Nancy Reagan entertained old friends from Hollywood in the White House, veteran stars like Charlton Heston and Jimmy Stewart. With George Bush, there were only rare glimpses of glitter: drop-bys by Bo Derek and Michael Jackson and the pumping-up appearances of Arnold Schwarzenegger.

A Hot Script

But now there is a Democratic President whose nickname is Elvis and who likes Hollywood, a town that was slow to warm to him as a candidate but now seems to be in a stampede.

As Peter Guber, the chairman of Sony Pictures Entertainment, put it: "The herding mentality is so strong here that when a script is hot, everyone goes after it, whether they've read it or not."

Having become more sophisticated politically, many in Hollywood's royalty now want the same sort of access that other valuable constituencies like Wall Street have long enjoyed.

"Celebrities don't want to just be called to write checks," said Margery Tabankin, the executive director of the Hollywood Women's Political Committee and the head of the Barbra Streisand Foundation, a charitable organization. "Nobody in Hollywood comes to the table thinking that they have the answers on Bosnia. Come on! But they do come as artists, pained by human suffering, who want to bring their creative skills to the process."

Hollywood Commitments

She said Hollywood types were helping to develop marketing themes for Administration programs and were committed to make personal appearances and public-service announcements.

A couple of Clinton strategists, detecting some negative sentiment about Mr. Clinton's celebrity connections showing up in polls, have warned that the President and his bedazzled young aides should cool their romance with Hollywood because it gives a liberal and elitist cast to a White House that wants to appear centrist and populist.

Even some on the West Coast privately worry that Mr. Clinton might be too taken with what one calls "the siren song that is so alluring to politicians."

"Frankly," said this powerful member of the Hollywood set who is close to the Clintons, "he'd be very wise to keep us at arm's length."

Politicians have been hurt in the past by being too closely identified with the city confected of dreams and desire: John F. Kennedy was drawn to that world, hanging around with movie stars and visiting Frank Sinatra in Las Vegas, Nev. The friendship of Gary Hart and Warren Beatty became emblematic of the sometimes dangerous liaison between these worlds, one Puritan, the other sybaritic.

Loss of Temper

At least one Clinton strategist was openly contemptuous of the idea of catering to Hollywood. When the White House invited a group of Hollywood people to a health-care briefing, James Carville, one of the briefers, lost his Southern-fried temper and lectured them in a profane manner that made it clear that he did not believe that their affluent lives had equipped them to devise a plan to sell health care to average, struggling Americans.

Gary David Goldberg, the producer and director of such television series as "Family Ties" and "Brooklyn Bridge," stormed out and later told The Los Angeles Times that Mr. Carville had acted like "Anthony Perkins playing Fidel Castro on acid."

Mr. Carville seems relatively unrepentant, saying only: "Do I use bad words from time to time? Yes. They started telling me how many degrees they had. Somebody blurted out, 'I have a Ph.D. in communications from U.C.L.A.' Well, wowee-kazowee!"

But every day there is a bit more tinsel draped on the White House. On Thursday, Hillary Rodham Clinton sat for a photographic session with Kenny Rogers, the country singer who photographs stars on the side.

David Geffen, the producer and record-industry executive, and Michael Medavoy, the chairman of Tri-star Pictures, telephone Thomas F. McLarty 3d, the White House chief of staff, to jawbone about the economy, and Mr. Geffen is looking for an apartment in Washington. Judy Collins, the singer, the Thomasons and the Medavoys have all spent the night in the Lincoln Bedroom, and Liza Minelli is invited to stay over next month. (Sending a letter to a fellow movie mogul on the stationery kept in the residence is now the ultimate bit of Hollywood one-upmanship.)

Last month, a Hollywood group, including Billy Crystal, Christopher Reeve, John Ritter, Sam Waterston and Lindsay Wagner, checked out the Oval Office and White House mess, met the President and Vice President and got environmental briefings from Interior Secretary Bruce Babbitt; Carol M. Browner, the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency; Timothy E. Wirth, the Under Secretary of State for Global Affairs, and Katie McGinty, the White House director of environmental policy.

Ambitious Schedule

Markie Post, a cast member of the Thomason-produced series "Hearts Afire," and Ivan Reitman, the director of "Dave," have dropped by to watch the President deliver his Saturday radio address.

On a clear day in Washington, you can see Barbra Streisand forever. In the last few weeks, she has popped up as a guest at the annual Gridiron dinner, slept over in the Queen's Bedroom in the White House and attended the health-care briefing.

Her schedule this past week was as ambitious as Senator Bob Dole's. A week ago, she went to the White House Correspondents' Dinner as a guest of Newsweek and chatted with Gen. Colin L. Powell, the Chairman of the Joint Chiefs of Staff, about Bosnia and homosexuals in the military. On Monday night, as Federal Bureau of Investigation agents stood guard, she hashed over issues with Attorney General Janet Reno during dinner at Citronelle, a modish Georgetown restaurant. On Tuesday, she met with female House members by day and went to a Democratic fund-raising event by night. On Wednesday afternoon, she made phone calls from the study off the Oval Office and then dined at a Georgetown home with Labor Secretary Robert B. Reich and a trio of eligible Senators, Bob Kerrey of Nebraska, Christopher J. Dodd of Connecticut and William S. Cohen of Maine.

Consider the scene on Thursday night, at a dinner party for the newly confirmed Ambassador to France, Pamela Harriman, at the Georgetown home of Katharine Graham, the chairwoman of the Washington Post Company.

From Bosnia to Camcorders

Barry Diller, the former chairman of Paramount Pictures and Fox Inc. who now owns part of QVC, a television shopping channel, joined some politicians and journalists on Mrs. Graham's terrace who were discussing whether Bosnia could turn into a Vietnam.

Mr. Diller listened for a while and then changed the subject to show business. "QVC is wonderful," he said. "The other night we sold 3,000 camcorders for $800 apiece."

After meeting with President Boris Yeltsin of Russia last month in Vancouver, British Columbia, Mr. Clinton had a late party in his suite with a bunch of Hollywood celebrities, including Sharon Stone, Richard Dreyfuss and Richard Gere.

Mr. Gere took the opportunity to lobby the President about meeting with the Dalai Lama, a conversation Mr. Clinton tried to sidestep by telling the actor that his China policy was not yet set.

"Hollywood people have realized that they don't have to be window dressing, that on particular issues they care deeply about, they can exercise their right to influence policy direction, whether it be the White House, the state house or city hall," said Donna Bojarsky, an adviser to Mr. Dreyfuss on public policy. (It is chic in Hollywood for celebrities to have their own political consultants.)

At the invitation of Time, Ms. Bojarsky and Mr. Dreyfuss flew in for the White House Correspondents' Dinner and a glittering post-dinner party put on by Vanity Fair.

Vendela, the Sports Illustrated swimsuit model, quickly deserted a conversation with Michael Douglas when she caught sight of George Stephanopoulos. "You're so cute; I've seen you on television," the Swedish model cooed at the spokesman, who was speechless with appreciation.

Nearby, Ms. Streisand was analyzing news coverage of the President's first 100 days with Dee Dee Myers, the Clinton press secretary. And in another dark corner, Mr. Douglas, a guest of Howard Fineman, the Newsweek political correspondent, was deep in conversation about Bosnia with the Ambassador to the United Nations Madeleine K. Albright.

Mr. Douglas was the most coveted celebrity that evening, even outshining the President who had an off night with a speech that was not very funny and contained a couple of gaffes. The actor wanted to talk issues, shrugging off inquiries about his steamy love scenes with Sharon Stone in "Basic Instinct" with the comment: "Another day, another dollar."

Politicians are borrowing more and more heavily from popular culture.

Fans Make No Apologies

Two people in the White House, at least, are not making any bones about being huge fans.

Mark D. Gearan, the deputy chief of staff, keeps a video camera in his desk so he can ask stars to film messages to his 1-year-old daughter, Madeleine. "I feel like a bad reporter for Variety lurking in the West Wing with my camcorder waiting to catch celebrities," he said.

And then there is the President, who with the First Lady recently took Paul Newman and Joanne Woodward to dinner at Galileo, a Washington restaurant.

"He grew up watching movies like 'The Hustler,' 'Hud' and 'Cat on a Hot Tin Roof' and he still gets genuinely blown away by spending time with some of these people," Dee Dee Myers said. "There's still a lot of the kid from Hope, Ark., in him."

Shifting List Of Prospects To Be Justice

By STEPHEN LABATON
Special to The New York Times

WASHINGTON, May 8 — President Clinton is expected to announce an appointment to the Supreme Court within the next two or three weeks, White House officials said, although no one has emerged in the two-month search as a front runner.

Mr. Clinton is described by aides as preferring a woman, but several men have been on a list of candidates that has been growing and shrinking almost daily since Associate Justice Byron R. White announced in March that he would be retiring this summer when the Court term ends. Senate aides say it will take six weeks between a nomination and the beginning of hearings, and the White House wants confirmation proceedings to be completed in July, before the Senate leaves Aug. 9 for a monthlong recess.

Aides say that Mr. Clinton has eliminated many names while other officials have added others, and by all outward appearances he does not appear to have settled on even a short-list of candidates. The initial list was said to have included dozens of judges, law professors and politicians.

Closely Involved President

Senior lawmakers in Congress say they have not been provided any names, and officials say the President has not spoken to any judge or other candidate about the job. His advisers say they do not know whether he will interview one or several candidates once the list is culled down, or simply select someone who is already familiar enough to him that a meeting would be unnecessary.

By most accounts, the President has played a more involved role in the selection process than any of his recent predecessors, and if there is a single reason why this search has taken significantly longer than previous Supreme Court searches, it is because it has largely been playing out in Mr. Clinton's head.

As a former state Attorney General and professor of constitutional law, he has long expressed a fascination with the Court, and his participation in the search has made it more demanding for the White House staff. He is described by some aides as regularly mulling over dossiers of candidates that include their opinions and writings and ordering his advisers to return with more names. He has also wavered over which constituencies the nomination should appeal to; in particular, the President has been concentrating on female, Hispanic and Jewish candidates.

He and his advisers have said they are looking for a progressive thinker who believes in a constitutional right to abortion and privacy as well as someone who would be able to forge coalitions. As their model, they have pointed to former Associate Justice William J. Brennan.

Presidents Ronald Reagan and George Bush, by contrast, selected six of the nine Justices now on the Court by taking the recommendations of their senior advisers and doing almost no selection work on their own. They would frequently name replacements within days of a Justice's announcement of his retirement.

Unlike his predecessors, who were in office for considerable periods before having to make an appointment, Mr. Clinton was in office for barely two months when Justice White announced his plans. Indeed, Mr. Clinton praised the Justice for giving him so long to conduct a search.

Starting From Scratch

Last month, White House officials told some lawmakers that the President had begun the search from scratch after two leading contenders, Gov. Mario M. Cuomo and Judith Kaye, the chief judge of the New York Court of Appeals, removed themselves from consideration.

Clinton uses plenty of time and names in a nominee search.

So far, the candidates under the most serious consideration for Justice White's seat have mostly been judges. Officials say that the list has included Shirley S. Abrahamson of the Wisconsin Supreme Court and five Federal appeals court judges: Richard S. Arnold of Little Rock, Ark.; Stephen G. Breyer of Boston; Ruth Bader Ginsburg of Washington; Mary M. Schroeder of Phoenix, and Stephanie K. Seymour of Tulsa, Okla. Another judge who has been mentioned is Jose A. Cabranes of Federal District Court in Connecticut.

Officials emphasized this week that many others whom they would not identify have also been under consideration and it was impossible even to point to possible front runners.

Constraints on Choices

They said that Mr. Clinton had instructed aides to look beyond the courts for possible candidates and include lawmakers and state officials, although in searching for a politician, the White House faces some constraints.

Aides said Mr. Clinton might have been inclined to select a senator like his fellow alumnus from Yale Law School, Joseph I. Lieberman of Connecticut; or the majority leader, George J. Mitchell of Maine, who was a United States Attorney and a Federal district judge in Maine before he arrived in Washington, or Paul S. Sarbanes of Maryland, who graduated from Harvard Law School and practiced for seven years after clerking for a Federal appeals judge.

But the Democrats' slim majority in the Senate makes it politically unpalatable to do anything that would erode the party's control of Congress, particularly in light of the recent failure of the Administration's economic stimulus package in the Senate.

Mr. Clinton has not given serious consideration to elevating Attorney General Janet Reno to the Court, an aide said, largely because the Administration does not have the stomach to go through yet another search for a new leader of the Justice Department.

White House aides say the strongest influence over the decision will come from Hillary Rodham Clinton. In addition to her, the search for a new Justice is being conducted by the White House counsel, Bernard W. Nussbaum; his deputy, Vince Foster, and Ronald Klain, an associate White House counsel who used to be a clerk to Justice White and a senior aide to Senator Joseph R. Biden, the Delaware Democrat who heads the Senate Judiciary committee. Bruce Lindsey, director of personnel at the White House, has also been heavily involved.

Health Insurance Merger: A Risky Mix?

By PETER KERR

News Analysis

By pledging that workers' compensation and automobile insurance will be part of an overhaul of the nation's health-care system, the Clinton Administration appears ready to plunge into quagmires that until now have never been the territory of the Federal Government.

The two insurance systems pay more than $42 billion annually for injuries and illnesses resulting from workplace and traffic accidents. By merging both into standard health coverage, the Administration hopes to save billions of dollars, bringing medical treatments paid for by all three systems under tighter cost controls.

In theory, experts agree, the idea makes sense in its simplicity.

But the analysts also say the changes could vastly alter the way the property casualty insurance industry and its agents do business. For one, private insurers who now collect more than $30 billion in workers' compensation premiums from employers would see their business shrink drastically. To a lesser degree, so would many automobile insurers.

Some Policy Questions

In addition, White House aides must grapple with these and other extremely difficult questions of public policy:

¶How is the nation going to pay for another expensive addition to standard health-care coverage?

¶How will the White House persuade organized labor to give up some workers' compensation benefits that it has had for most of this century?

¶How can the Administration's experts be sure that costs to employers will really go down?

¶Will the new merged system still have incentives for employers to keep their workplaces safe and for drivers to avoid accidents?

"At first it makes sense, but as you being looking into it, it loses some of its attractions," said Alan Tepp, vice chairman of the California Workers' Compensation Institute, a not-for-profit research institution. "The question is whether there is really going to be a constituency for it other than policy makers and academics."

On Friday, Hillary Rodham Clinton told a gathering of business leaders that the Administration planned to merge the parts of workers' compensation and automobile insurance into standard health insurance coverage. The result, she pledged, would be sharply reduced costs for employers. The premiums of both types of insurance have been rising even faster than health-care costs in recent years.

Orin Kramer, a financial analyst and former Carter Administration regulatory specialist, said premiums for medical care under workers' compensation and automobile insurance represent nearly 18 percent of the premiums collected by the property casualty industry. If the industry loses that business, experts expect price competition to increase in other lines of insurance and profits to be more difficult for property casualty insurers.

The companies most likely to suffer under such a plan, Wall Street analysts say, are those that sell workers' compensation and automobile insurance but that do not sell health insurance or run health maintenance organizations. For example, Liberty Mutual Insurance Company of Boston, the nation's largest workers' compensation insurer, would probably lose business. But diversified insurers like Prudential and Aetna might compensate by picking up business in the health maintenance organizations.

Another complication of the proposal would be how to pay for it.

Even if merging the systems saved 25 percent of the costs of medical care for highway and workplace injuries, the Administration is taking on $30 billion in additional obligations for the health insurance system.

"They already are under an enormous amount of pressure to find ways to pay for health care," Mr. Kramer said. "To whatever extent you have a political problem rising out of the cost of what you do, those problems are intensified."

The Administration must also figure out how to reconcile the glaring differences between the medical benefits available under workers' compensation and coverage available under most standard health-care plans.

The nation's state-regulated workers' compensation systems were one of the first victories of labor early in this century. Following a system established in Bismarckian Germany, employers agreed to pay for medical treatments, rehabilitation, lost wages and death benefits when a worker was physically hurt on the job. In return, workers gave up the right to sue their employers for injuries.

Now the Administration would be asking labor and management to alter that historic covenant.

Unlike standard health insurance coverage, workers' compensation protects workers from the first day on the job without any waiting period. It requires no co-payments or deductibles and puts no limit on the cost of treatment. The employer is liable to pay for treatment as long as the employees live.

Organized labor, including spokesmen for the A.F.L.-C.I.O., has said it would oppose giving up those benefits. But some Administration aides hope that organized labor will be willing to make concessions on these points in return of guaranteed health insurance for the nation's 37 million uninsured.

The Administration is also concerned about how separating the medical component of workers' compensation that pays for injuries from the disability component that pays lost wages could harm employers.

If workers are treated in health maintenance organizations that intend to keep their costs low, an injured worker may well receive the minimum care. As a result, the worker would be out longer and the amount employers will continue to pay in lost wages could jump.

Carter, at Rice, Urges Help for the Less Fortunate in the World

Former President Jimmy Carter urged more than 1,000 graduates at Rice University in Houston yesterday to use their educational opportunities and their commitment to freedom to help less fortunate people around the world.

Mr. Carter devoted most of his commencement address to global conflicts. So-called ethnic cleansing, he said, is not unique to Bosnia, with racial and religious divisions now fueling more wars than at any other time in history. "Racial, religious, ethnic differences still cause tremendous suffering, deliberately perpetrated by one human being upon another," he said.

Mr. Carter, a Democrat from Georgia who was President from 1977 to 1981, told the graduating students that the Carter Center in Atlanta is now monitoring 112 global conflicts, including 32 major wars.

"This century, far beyond any other in history, has been burdened with tragedy, the unanticipated, deliberate murder of people by their own governments," he said.

With the end of the cold war, the United States as the sole superpower has become increasingly responsible for influencing the world, the former President said.

"We can't be the world's policeman — that's not what I'm talking about," he continued. "But the economic and the political and the military and the cultural influences of the United States permeate the world."

He said it was too early to say how the United States would measure up to the challenge of using its expertise and resources to promote global peace, democracy and economic justice.

"The greatest discrimination in the earth today, including in our own country, is discrimination by the rich against the poor," Mr. Carter said.

After his speech he left for Paraguay to help oversee that country's Presidential election today. The former President has worked as an election observer in Haiti, Panama and several other countries.

Mr. Carter spoke at commencement exercises that were held under sunny skies at the university's academic quadrangle.

Rice awarded bachelors' degrees to 672 undergraduates and masters' degrees to 307 graduate students. The university does not confer honorary degrees.

Howard University

Commerce Secretary Ronald H. Brown, a former Democratic national chairman, was the main speaker at Howard University's commencement exercises yesterday on the university's main campus in Washington.

Mr. Brown told the 2,200 graduates that "we live in times of great challenge, hope and opportunity, times of transition and change," and urged them to "keep the drum beat of activism alive" and "to rouse those who have become too comfortable for the struggle and to reinvigorate those too tired to fight."

The university conferred 1,500 bachelors' degrees and 700 masters' degrees.

Mr. Brown was awarded an honorary doctor of laws degree. Also receiving honorary degrees were Debbie Allen, the writer, choreographer and producer, and Dr. James P. Comer, a child psychiatrist at Yale University.

The late Reginald F. Lewis, former chairman and chief executive of TLC Beatrice International, was posthumously awarded an honorary degree.

James Madison University

Gov. L. Douglas Wilder of Virginia delivered the main address yesterday at commencement exercises for 1,745 students at James Madison University. The university's 84th annual commencement was held on the campus in Harrisonburg, Va.

The speech by Mr. Wilder, the first black to be elected Governor, continues a recent tradition at James Madison: each of his two immediate predecessors, Charles S. Robb and Gerald L. Baliles, addressed the university's graduates while serving as Virginia's chief executive.

After Governor Wilder's address, graduates of the university's six colleges and its general-studies program attended smaller ceremonies where they received their diplomas.

Indiana University

At ceremonies marking its 163d annual commencement, Indiana University began conferring undergraduate and graduate degrees on 14,776 students yesterday.

The ceremonies began with the presentation of 8,166 degrees in Memorial Stadium at the main campus in Bloomington. Degrees were presented to 6,116 undergraduate students and 1,984 graduate students.

Commencement ceremonies will continue at the university's eight campuses, beginning today and continuing through the week.

Robert Shaw, a former choral director at the Berkshire Music Center at Tanglewood, Mass., and a faculty member at the Julliard School of Music, delivered the main address. Mr. Shaw, the conductor laureate of the Atlanta Symphony Orchestra, received an honorary Doctor of Music degree.

Florida Electrocutes A Vietnam Veteran For a 1979 Murder

STARKE, Fla., May 8 (AP) — A Vietnam veteran diagnosed with post-traumatic stress disorder was executed tonight in the electric chair for the 1979 shotgun murder of a gasoline station owner.

The veteran, Larry Joe Johnson, was pronounced dead at 10:07 P.M., said Jo Miglino, a spokeswoman for Gov. Lawton Chiles.

Earlier today, the United States Supreme Court denied two separate petitions to review Mr. Johnson's case and the accompanying applications for a stay of execution.

Veterans' groups had called for state officials to spare Mr. Johnson's life. The effort succeeded in winning at least one delay.

Mr. Johnson, 49, was condemned for killing James Hadden, 67, who was killed with a sawed-off shotgun during a robbery.

Delay in February

Mr. Johnson came within days of execution in February, but Governor Chiles delayed it to review a State Supreme Court suggestion that Mr. Johnson had been psychologically damaged by his military service.

But after his review, Mr. Chiles issued another death warrant.

"I recognize the Vietnam veteran syndrome," Mr. Chiles said last week. "I do not think it applies in this case."

During the war, Mr. Johnson was in a Navy construction unit in Vietnam. After he received an honorable discharge, he joined the Kentucky National Guard. His military career ended in 1974, when he was hit by a smoke grenade during a training exercise.

That accident caused brain damage and Mr. Johnson spent years in a military psychiatric ward.

The war stress argument had failed to avert an execution before in Florida. Another Vietnam veteran, David Funchess, who was convicted of a double murder in Jacksonville, was put to death in 1986, four years after the state rejected his appeal based on post-traumatic stress.

Mr. Johnson was the 201st person executed nationwide since the Supreme Court allowed states to resume capital punishment in 1976. He became the 31st inmate executed since Florida reinstated the death penalty in 1979.

Greyhound Bus Drivers End 3-Year Strike With New Pact

DALLAS, May 8 (AP) — Union drivers for Greyhound Lines Inc. have approved a six-year contract, ending a three-year strike. The walkout left hundreds of drivers unemployed and crippled the interstate bus company.

The international president of the Amalgamated Transit Union, Jim La Sala, said Friday that the Amalgamated Council of Greyhound Local Unions approved an accord that was announced April 20 by company and union leaders.

The contract, which expires Jan. 31, 1999, provides annual raises that will increase the $13.85 hourly wage for drivers to $16.55 by March 1, 1998.

The president of Greyhound, Frank Schmieder, called the vote terrific news and said the contract was "certainly a win-win situation for labor and management."

The company, which plans to distribute $22 million in back pay under the settlement, will recall 550 striking drivers by July 1.

Arrest in Secret-Documents Case

SAN FRANCISCO, May 8 (AP) — A former police officer accused of spying on groups as diverse as neo-Nazis and Greenpeace was arrested Thursday on 11 felony charges involving the theft of confidential government documents, the police said today.

The former officer, Thomas Gerard, was arrested at San Francisco International Airport on returning from the Philippines. He was freed on bail and faces arraignment next week.

Mr. Gerard, who said he worked for the Central Intelligence Agency while on the San Francisco police force, left the Philippines partly because he feared for his life, Capt. John Willett said, adding, "He felt the C.I.A. might have a contract out on him."

Mr. Gerard, 50, told the police that he had damaging information on the C.I.A. Officers acting on a tip from an informer in the Philippines arrested Mr. Gerard, who was booked on eight counts of stealing government documents and one count each of computer theft, burglary and conspiracy.

Bail was set at $250,000. But at a hearing Mr. Gerard's lawyer, James Lassart, asked that it be reduced, saying Mr. Gerard would not flee the country. Judge Philip Moscone of Municipal Court lowered the bail to $20,000.

The charges carry a maximum term of more than 16 years in prison.

Mr. Gerard is accused of illegally gathering information from police and government files. Mr. Gerard and an art dealer here, Roy E. Bullock, are also suspected of relaying information to the Anti-Defamation League of B'nai B'rith and South African intelligence officers. The league, Mr. Bullock and Mr. Gerard have denied doing anything illegal or improper.

Mr. Gerard, the first person to face charges in the case, retired from the police force and moved to the Philippines island of Palawan as the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the police tried to question him. He returned to the United States, the police said, because he wanted to see his family, wanted his day in court and feared that the C.I.A. planned to kill him.

The C.I.A. has refused to confirm that Mr. Gerard was an agent.

2 Killed by Tornadoes in Plains

By The Associated Press

About a dozen tornadoes struck South Dakota, Nebraska and Kansas on Friday, killing two people, flattening several homes and derailing a train.

Residents of eastern South Dakota began assessing the damage yesterday after five tornadoes smashed homes and businesses. A truck driver was killed when high winds caused a traffic accident.

At least five tornadoes also struck south-central Nebraska, with one destroying two homes and another derailing a Union Pacific train about 10 miles southeast of Hastings. No one was injured and no hazardous materials spilled from the train, said Sheriff Richard Marsh of Clay County.

In central Kansas, a woman who was camping at Wilson Lake was killed and two people were injured when a tornado touched down, the National Weather Service said. Funnel clouds were also seen over other parts of Kansas.

Winds Reach 126 M.P.H.

Some of the worst damage occurred in Brookings, a city of 7,700 people in eastern South Dakota, where winds of up to 126 miles an hour ripped roofs from apartment buildings, destroyed mobile homes and damaged cars and businesses. Hospital officials reported treating 12 people for minor injuries.

Other tornadoes knocked vehicles from Interstate 29 in Lincoln County, in southeastern South Dakota. A boy seeking shelter under an overpass was injured when he was struck by a car on the interstate, the authorities said.

In Nebraska, Lee Johnson said he and his wife, Ruth, were in the basement of their home when a tornado struck his farm about 20 miles north of the Kansas line.

A friend had called the couple and warned, "You better be watching the clouds; there's a tornado headed right your way," said Mr. Johnson, 67.

"We didn't hear a thing," Mr. Johnson said. "Never did hear that roar."

But he said that when he left the basement to see if the tornado had passed, he saw his shed swirling through the air. Equipment from the shed was scattered over two miles.

Pursuing Hope In the Trenches At Head Start

WHITE PLAINS

AT 9:30 on weekday mornings, in a classroom full of toys and books at St. Bernard's Roman Catholic Church here, Dr. Paul Donahue and his staff of four — a social worker and three teachers — welcome 12 preschoolers to what may be the roughest Head Start class in America. These 3- to 5-year-olds were expelled from other Head Starts. All are homeless, but too wild for the "regular" Head Start classes for the homeless at St. Bernard's.

Their mothers are crack addicts, mentally ill or abused, or all those things. The children suffer and can be insufferable. "We've made a lot of progress," Dr. Donahue, a psychologist who started the class two years ago, said as he awaited their arrival. "Here they are now. Stan! Stan the man. Stan, put down that barrel. Stan! . . . Didi, good morning. I heard you were hitting on the bus? . . . Stan, let's stop smashing that doll. Stan! We're not going to smash that baby all day, are we?"

In the play kitchen, Monica Morton, the social worker, examined a cut on Didi's hand. "Mommy pushed you on the floor? Did you tell Mommy, 'Don't push me on the floor'? We tell mommies not to hit kids. Your mommy's a little mixed-up."

For Mother's Day, they'd made tissue-paper flowers and pins from wooden ice cream spoons. The mothers were called about coming to class Friday for a party, but would they? "She said she was angry," Jashud said when asked about his mother on Wednesday. "She don't want to talk to anybody."

"This is a beautiful book about a very important holiday," Carol Belmont, the head teacher said in reading circle. "I want to see your listening ears now." The noise stopped. They love when Ms. Belmont reads. She held up the story of a young mouse, "What is Mother's Day?" The book had flaps with hidden pictures. For 15 minutes, there was silence except for learning. This was amazing, considering that when Shakia first came, she cried all day; Kyle wouldn't get out of a fetal position, and Jahmal stared blankly, eyes fluttering.

Next they practiced the song "Mommy, Mommy, How I Love You," singing the last line especially loud: "Mommy, you, you make me feel so special." On the big day, that was to be the cue for presenting the tissue-paper flowers.

Dr. Donahue works for the Center for Preventive Psychiatry here, and the idea behind this expensive pilot program is to provide therapy, to be the children's advocates and to teach them to recognize the anger, disappointment and madness in their lives before they bury those feelings with blind rage. "If we wait until they're 7, it's too late," he says. Officials at the National Head Start Association are not aware of another program like it.

Dr. Donahue watched Jashud play with the doll house. "Kids are going to get kidnapped," Jashud said.

"Does Mommy talk about that?" Dr. Donahue asked. Jashud nodded.

"Have you ever spent time in your house all alone?"

"Yeah," Jashud said, "and the door be locked so no strangers come in." Jashud was piling furniture to barricade the front door of the doll house. "When Mommy comes back and this door locked, she tells me, 'Open it.' "

"You know," said Dr. Donahue, "5-year-olds shouldn't be left alone. Why don't you talk about that in group today? I'm so happy to see you doing such a good job today. No fighting."

"And no cursing," said Jashud, sucking his thumb.

In the play kitchen, Ms. Morton was trying to get Kyle to answer the toy phone. "Mommy wants to talk to you."

"I'll call her back," Kyle said. His mother had a breakdown last fall, and Kyle's father was awarded custody. The social worker tried again.

"Be quiet," Kyle said, "I hate you."

"You're angry and using your words; that's good," Ms. Morton said. But that was the end of words. Kyle screamed, threw a chair, then sobbed uncontrollably in the woman's arms.

Sitting on mats in group therapy, the children said they were angry about stepping on mommy's crack vials and being hit by mommy, and scared of monsters when mommy left them alone. Jonathan closed his eyes and shrieked.

Dr. Donahue didn't know what to expect Friday, but Kyle's dad and everyone else's mother came to the party except Shakia's. A Head Start worker called her and said: "Just come. Get in a cab. We'll pay." And she did.

The ice cream spoon pins were great, setting off a round of lipsticky kisses. Everyone had their listening ears on, and like clockwork, the children pulled out their tissue-paper flowers as they belted out a last verse of, "Mommy, you, you make me feel so special."

Most of the mommies looked young enough to need their own mommies.

Among Blacks, New Voices Emerge

A Younger Generation Tests the Levers of Power and Change

By CATHERINE S. MANEGOLD

In Brooklyn, at the Concord Baptist Church, the Rev. Gary Simpson talks of Malcolm X and rage, the rap group X-Clan and community growth. The result: more young blacks at Sunday services.

In Harlem, a group called HIT, or Harlem Initiatives Together, brings together embittered residents to let them share complaints, aggravations and ideas. The result: a campaign to get Harlem shops to carry fresher meat and vegetables.

At Columbia University, Khadijah F. Sharif leaves campus to attend a meeting of a group of young black feminists. The result: a raucous conference focusing on everything from parenting to sexual harassment.

New voices of leadership are emerging in predominantly black neighborhoods in this city. Using words like "empowerment," "mentoring" and "self-esteem" they are sending the message that change will come only when it is forced from within — block by city block — in such projects as urging City Hall to clean up the Harlem end of Central Park.

Some are in their 40's and found a calling to political activism in the days of the Rev. Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. and Cesar Chavez. Others are barely out of their teens but already are being swept into a community hungry for their ideas and eager for their success. Between them is a generation of powerful professionals who came of age in an era of integration and high hopes but who now find the landscape of many inner-city communities marred by homelessness, hopelessness, violence and illiteracy. All share several traits: impatience with traditional black leadership and the fear that politics-as-usual will only lead to more despair.

Many younger blacks say they want to get involved to fill what they see as a vacuum left them by their elders. "There hasn't really been much there for us," said Errol Kenya James, a soft-spoken 21-year-old just appointed to the Children's Defense Fund's Black Student Leadership Network. "We've got a responsibility to train our younger brothers and sisters. Right now kids are saying 'if I grow up,' not 'when I grow up.' There are some full-time hard-core youth out there and those are the

Union Chief Backs Plan For Teachers

Calls a State Proposal A Basis for a Contract

By SAM DILLON

Conceding that New York City teachers must greatly lower their salary expectations, the president of the teachers' union yesterday urged her members to accept a state panel's recommendations for a wage increase that is only slightly above what other city workers have received.

City officials said the action by Sandra Feldman, the union president, was a "positive step" toward settling the 20-month dispute between the city and its 85,000 teachers, a nettlesome standoff that Mayor David N. Dinkins badly wants to resolve before the mayoral campaign begins in earnest.

The two sides remain at odds over whether the teachers' salaries could be augmented by additional funds the Board of Education has received from the state.

A nonbinding report issued two weeks ago by the state's Public Employment Relations Board, Ms. Feldman said, offered the framework for an acceptable settlement. She said she would urge its acceptance by the union's delegate assembly, its main governing body.

The board's report calls for a retroactive teacher contract with raises of 8.5 percent over 39 months. The pact, which would be retroactive to September 1991, when the last contract expired, would grant the teachers one-quarter of 1 percent more than contracts recently approved by other city unions.

"Next week I plan to go to our delegate assembly to ask for acceptance of that report — which forces us to greatly lower our expectations, at least for now — as a basis for negotiating a satisfactory conclusion to this dispute," Ms. Feldman said.

That phrase drew a few hisses and some applause from the 1,600 teachers gathered at the New York Hilton for an annual meeting of the union.

'Positive Step'

"All I can say is, it's a positive step," James F. Hanley, the city's Commissioner of labor relations said of Ms. Feldman's remarks.

Leland Jones, Mr. Dinkins's spokesman, noted that the teachers' union began the negotiations with demands for wage hikes of nearly 25 percent. "This is good in the HEMPSTEAD, L.I., May 8 — When Browning-Ferris Industries of Houston wanted the contract to build an incinerator here, it did something any newcomer hoping for a cut of the garbage disposal business in the Republican stronghold of Nassau County would do: it turned to Armand P. D'Amato, younger brother of United States Senator Alfonse M. D'Amato.

True, Armand D'Amato had made many a foe in starting up the Hempstead Resource Recovery Plant, a hulking environmental hazard that Browning-Ferris was proposing to replace. But the company hired Mr. D'Amato anyway to represent Browning-Ferris in its bids, which totaled $1 billion over 20 years.

Eliminating the Competition

His approach for the new client was vintage D'Amato: he introduced corporate executives to the local powers, saw that their proposals got through the right channels, and virtually eliminated any competition as industry insiders presumed that his association with Browning-Ferris assured it the garbage contract.

But what passed for business as usual in Nassau County drew more intense scrutiny when players were the Navy and his brother in Washington. On Friday Mr. D'Amato was convicted on 7 of 24 counts of mail fraud for a scheme that involved urging the

POLITICAL NOTES

For Ex-Governor Wilson, a Bridge to Immortality

By KEVIN SACK

The bill probably will not be a favorite of those high-in-the-sky radio traffic reporters, but there is no reason to think it will not sail through the Legislature.

Gov. Mario M. Cuomo has proposed lengthening the name of the Tappan Zee Bridge to the Malcolm Wilson Tappan Zee Bridge, in honor of the state's 50th governor.

Mr. Cuomo, a Democrat, maintains that Mr. Wilson, a Republican, has never received the recognition he deserves. For 15 years, Mr. Wilson served in the shadows as Nelson A. Rockefeller's lieutenant governor. After Mr. Rockefeller resigned to become Vice President, Mr. Wilson took the helm for one year before losing to Hugh L. Carey in the 1974 election.

"The truth is he was largely responsible for Rockefeller getting to be Governor," Mr. Cuomo said last week in a radio interview. "He was a political force and intelligence behind him. And most of the good things that Rockefeller achieved, Wilson was a part of for all those years. But Wilson never got the chance to be No. 1. And when finally it came in a limited way in 1974, he had the bad luck to be following Nixon and Watergate."

Mr. Cuomo said he thought the Tappan Zee Bridge "is an appropriate symbol, I think, because it connects Westchester with the rest of the state, which Malcolm Wilson did in a very real way."

Mr. Wilson, who lives in Yonkers, is now 79 and still practices law every day out of his office in White Plains. He said in an interview that he told Mr. Cuomo he was "deeply grateful for his thoughtfulness."

He said he appreciated the attempt to name something for him while he was still alive. "Provided," he said with a laugh, "that the Legislature does it reasonably quickly."

The Job They Love to Mock

It's a job politicians love to make fun of, but that doesn't mean a few aren't lining up to run for New York City Council President, an office that will be officially known as public advocate the minute someone wins it this fall.

The latest aspirant is Assemblyman John A. Ravitz, a Manhattan Republican, who is considering an invitation from Rudolph W. Giuliani, the Republican mayoral hopeful, to run on his ticket.

Giuliani aides said the 32-year-old Mr. Ravitz, who has twice won his Assembly seat in an overwhelmingly Democratic district on the Upper East Side, might bring a nice ethnic balance (he is Jewish) and invigorate younger voters.

But one top Giuliani strategist said the campaign has not decided whether it makes sense to run on a ticket at all, since the candidates ultimately are elected independently.

Among the other possible candidates to fill the vacancy that would be created if Andrew J. Stein runs for mayor: Mark Green, a Democrat and the former City Consumer Affairs Commissioner; Senator Donald M. Halperin, a Brooklyn Democrat; Jackie Mason, the comedian, who plans to announce his independent candidacy tomorrow; Senator David A. Patterson, a Manhattan Democrat; Assemblyman Roberto Ramirez, a Bronx Democrat; Ron Reale, a Democrat and the president of the Transit Police Benevolent Association, and Fran Reiter, state chairwoman of the Liberal Party.

What's in a Name?

Throughout the campaign for New York State Comptroller, H. Carl McCall was forthcoming about most everything: how much money he was spending, his positions on key issues, even his arrest in a 1964 civil rights demonstration. But there was one thing he declined to disclose under any circumstance: his first name. What's the big deal? A lot of people think Herman is a very nice name.

Scouts vs. Governor

An old show business maxim warns: Never work with animals or children. Perhaps the political corollary should be: Never take on the Boy Scouts.

Mr. Cuomo and state environmental officials learned the hard way when they issued a new regulation two weeks ago prohibiting the Scouts from collecting returnable bottles and cans in state parks and campgrounds. The state, it seems, wanted to raise between $50,000 and $100,000 by collecting the containers and cashing them in for five-cent deposits.

But Boy Scout troops around the state protested the policy, saying it would deprive them of a major fund-raising vehicle. Many troops had been allowed to place bins in the parks for collecting bottles and cans, and without the bottles there would be no summer trips to Camp Wakponinee.

Mr. Cuomo first defended the measure, saying it was a better way to pay for a new recycling program in state campgrounds than raising taxes or fees. But last week, after a series of news reports portraying the state as Scrooge and the Scouts as Tiny Tims, the Governor reversed course. The Boy Scouts will be able to keep their existing bins, Mr. Cuomo decided, but no additional groups will be able to get in on the action.

Holtzman Leads in Poll

On the same day last week that City Comptroller Elizabeth Holtzman admitted she had made a mistake in permitting her office to recommend a banking company as an underwriter of city bonds while she owed the bank a large campaign debt, a poll highly favorable to Ms. Holtzman was released.

The poll, by New York 1 News, the cable news channel, showed Ms. Holtzman leading her probable opponent in the Democratic primary for comptroller, Assemblyman Alan Hevesi of Queens, by 63 percent to 20 percent, with 17 percent of those surveyed undecided.

The poll, conducted for the cable station by Lou Harris, surveyed 673 registered Democrats and had a margin of error of 5 percentage points. Mr. Hevesi showed some strength among white Roman Catholic Democrats and Queens residents, the survey reported, but Ms. Holtzman demonstrated a broad range of support from black, Jewish and Hispanic Democrats, as well as among young people, women and Democrats who described themselves as liberals.

The poll was taken during the third week of April, just as an article was published in The New York Times questioning the award in March of the lucrative standing as co-manager of a city bond sale to a bank that had granted a $450,000 loan last August to Ms. Holtzman's campaign for the United States Senate.

Ms. Holtzman formally recused herself from the selection last week and asked Mayor David N. Dinkins to reconsider the bank's selection. On Friday the Mayor removed the bank, Fleet Securities, as a city bond underwriter. The City Department of Investigation is examining whether Ms. Holtzman's loan influenced her staff's recommendation of Fleet.

Korean Gangsters Held in Extortion

The leader and four members of a Korean street gang have been arrested in connection with the extortion of at least 100 Asian restaurateurs and business owners in Manhattan, the police said yesterday.

The five members of Korean Power, or K.P., were arrested about 8:40 P.M on Friday in an apartment at 50 West 34th Street. The arrests culminated two months of surveillance and efforts to get the cooperation of business owners, said Lieut. Joseph A. Pollini, executive officer of the department's Major Case Squad.

The gang has about a dozen members, all natives of Seoul, South Korea, who range in age from 16 to 23, the police said. Gang members lived off money obtained from shaking down Korean owners of karaoke bars, restaurants and shops for $50 to $250 a week, Lieutenant Pollini said. The gang worked in an area bounded by 28th Street and 48th Street and Madison and Seventh Avenues, he said.

Queens Woman and 2 Children Slain

Suspect Is Critically Injured Jumping From a Six-Story Building

By GARRY PIERRE-PIERRE

A 23-year-old woman and her two children were stabbed to death and another woman was critically injured at a Queens housing project yesterday after a man attacked them with a knife, the police said. A family member said the man was a former boyfriend who had been recently released from prison.

Stephanie Pagan and her 8-month-old daughter were found dead at 5:45 A.M. in a sixth-floor apartment at the Queensbridge Houses at 41-01 Vernon Boulevard in Long Island City, said Amanita Duga, a spokeswoman for the New York City Housing Authority police. The third slaying victim, a 7-year-old girl, was pronounced dead on arrival at Elmhurst Hospital Center, Ms. Duga said.

Another victim, Ronicia Rodriguez, 20, a roommate of Ms. Pagan, was listed in critical condition from multiple stab wounds at Elmhurst Hospital Center.

Neighbors who heard a scuffle called the police, who chased the suspect to another building in the housing project. The man, whom police identified as Ronald Woodson, 22, of Ross Street in Brooklyn, jumped from the roof of the six-story building. He was listed in critical condition at Elmhurst Hospital Center. Mr. Woodson was charged with three counts of second-degree murder and one count of attempted murder.

'A Scream'

"I heard a scream so loud it woke me up, and I thought I was dreaming," said Claudette Outerbridge, 34, who lives with her two children directly below the victims' apartment. "Then I heard her screaming again, louder, 'Help me, please help me, somebody please dial 911.'"

Within minutes after the call two officers arrived at the housing project. Ms. Outerbridge said that one of them was visibly shaken after seeing the carnage.

"They came out of the apartment, one of them was crying," she said.

Ms. Outerbridge and other neighbors said Ms. Pagan had lived in the apartment for three months with the 8-month-old and Ms. Rodriguez. The woman's 7-year-old daughter lived with her grandmother in a different building in the project.

A woman who would only identify herself as another grandmother fell to her knees moments after she left the scene of the slaying.

"I can't deal with it," she said as her son and a police detective held her. "Take me away from this. My grandbaby is dead, and I don't know why."

Friends and neighbors said they did not know what the motive for the stabbings was, and the police would not release any information about the suspect. But the woman who said she was a grandmother of one of the children identified the suspect as a former boyfriend of the slaying victim.

Neighbors described Ms. Pagan as a quiet, dedicated mother who was always with her baby and who often baby-sat for a woman upstairs.

"I am stunned," said Peggy Roman, 42, standing near the tan-brick building, tears running down her face. "She always considered me as a second mother. She was a sweet, innocent and very nice girl."

A few hours before the incident, Ms. Roman said, she was at Ms. Pagan's apartment, and they were making plans for a Mother's Day celebration. They were going to a barbecue at nearby Rainey Park.

Like Earlier Case

Investigators drew parallels yesterday between the stabbings and the slayings of six people in an East Harlem apartment last week. The six people, including a baby, were beaten, stabbed and strangled by the mother's former boyfriend, the police said.

"The similarities are obvious," Ms. Duga said.

Ms. Duga said that the police believe that Ms. Pagan knew the suspect because there were no signs of forced entry in the two-bedroom apartment, which was heavily stained with blood.

Yesterday morning more than 50 residents gathered in front of the Queens apartment building, some crying and others appearing dazed.

"We're not all like this here," a man said. "This is the projects, but there are some good people here."

Wilhemina King, 29, who lives on the first floor of the building, said she heard someone running down the stairs about 6 A.M. "When I opened my door, he ran back upstairs," she said.

Yesterday afternoon, at 40-12 12th Street, about a quarter mile from Ms. Pagan's apartment, a custodian mopped up a trail of blood leading from the lobby to the sixth floor.

As the suspect fled the police, neighbors say, he stripped off all his clothes. He entered the building and ran up the stairs and onto the gravel roof where he ran across the roof and jumped. He landed on a patch of grass on the side of the building, they said. "He leapt just like a bird," said a witness, Hector Leon, as he spread his arms to demonstrate.

Mafia Tale: Looting the Steel of the West Side Highway

By SELWYN RAAB

When workers ripped out the last slab of steel from the West Side Highway four years ago, the crumbling hulk disappeared from the Manhattan landscape and faded from New York City's memory. At the time, few people were aware that the final section of the elevated road was demolished mainly by carpenters, not by ironworkers, who traditionally performed that job.

Now, two high-ranking Mafia defectors have come forward to tell the tale of how the carpenters were hired in an intricate mob scheme to reap a windfall from the highway's demise. The plot involved the cooperation of three organized-crime families, each trading favors and pulling strings with contractors and unions. In the end, the defectors said, the mobsters manipulated a $12 million state contract to walk off with 11,000 tons of salvageable steel and at least $800,000 in payoffs.

Through recent court documents from a Federal antiracketeering lawsuit against the carpenters' union, the deal for the steel was revealed in separate but similar versions by Salvatore Gravano, the former underboss of the Gambino crime family, and Alphonso D'Arco, the former acting boss of the Lucchese crime group.

'Sweetheart Deal'

It was, in Mr. D'Arco's words, a "sweetheart deal."

Law-enforcement authorities say the accounts by the two Mafia turncoats shed new light on organized

Carpenters instead of ironworkers, all part of the scheme.

crime's long-held influence over some unions and contractors in New York City's construction industry. Federal, state and city prosecutors and investigators maintain that the five Mafia families in the New York region — the Gambino, Genovese, Lucchese, Colombo and Bonanno groups — using their control of unions, extract payoffs from contractors for labor peace and bid-rigging.

Mr. Gravano, in a court affidavit, and Mr. D'Arco, in a statement to the Federal Bureau of Investigation, asserted that the demolition scheme was set up primarily to obtain the valuable steel girders of the old highway. Even the cobblestones were part of the deal, they said.

The four-mile stretch of the elevated highway from the Battery to 59th Street was built in the early 1930's. The state, fearing that it was collapsing, began to raze it in stages in 1975.

In March 1989, the Department of Transportation awarded a competitively bid contract and paid $12 million to the John P. Picone Company of Lawrence, L.I., to remove the last 0.8-mile section on 12th Avenue from 42d Street to 59th Street. Mr. Gravano and Mr. D'Arco both asserted that the Picone Company, which specializes in highway construction, was associated with the the Lucchese family, and Mr. D'Arco said that the company in the 1980's routinely made payoffs, sometimes under duress, to Lucchese members.

The demolition contract allowed Picone to sell salvageable materials from the job, and Mr. Gravano and Mr. D'Arco said the scent of the steel brought the Colombo family into the transaction. In their statements, they identified Thomas J. Petrizzo as a capo, or captain, in the Colombo family, who wanted the girders for A. J. Ross Logistics Inc. of Keasbey, N.J., a company that he headed in 1989. The Ross Company produces and sells steel bars used in buildings, bridges and roads.

An Irresistible Proposal

Mr. Petrizzo, the mob defectors said, controlled Local 1456 of the carpenters' union, a local that specializes in dock construction, and he offered Lucchese leaders an irresistible proposal. If they gave him the steel he would insure that carpenters and nonunion employees worked on the highway for lower wages than ironworkers, increasing profits for the Picone Company.

At the time, the ironworkers were paid about $22 an hour, $3 more than the carpenters' scale and $6 to $7 more than nonunion laborers.

Mr. Gravano said that Frederick W. Devine, who was the president of Carpenters Local 1456 in 1989, was associated with Mr. Petrizzo.

Mr. D'Arco told the F.B.I., "The labor peace which ensued helped Picone and Petrizzo make a large sum of money from the scrap steel alone," according to a 1991 report.

"To satisfy the Lucchese members," the F.B.I. quoted Mr. D'Arco, "Petrizzo gave them $800,000 from the profits made in the sweetheart deal with Picone, all of which went to Anthony Casso and Vic Amuso." Vittorio Amuso, who prosecutors say is boss of the family, and Anthony Casso, who prosecutors say is the underboss, were both convicted last year of Federal murder and racketeering charges.

Substantial Profit

Law-enforcement officials have said that Mr. Gravano and Mr. D'Arco did not know how much profit the Ross Company made from the steel but that both men believed it must have been substantial if Mr. Petrizzo turned over $800,000 to the Lucchese family.

Mr. Petrizzo resigned as president of the Ross Company last June but remains a member of its board. He did not return telephone calls to the company's office and has an unlisted number at his home in Manhasset, L.I.

The F.B.I. and state law-enforcement agencies list him as a capo, or captain, of a unit in the Colombo family. Mr. Petrizzo, citing his Constitutional rights, refused to be questioned by Federal prosecutors in the lawsuit, which was brought in 1990 by Federal prosecutors in Manhattan against the District Council of New York City and Vicinity of the United Brotherhood of Carpenters. The council represents Local 1456 and 30,000 carpenters and other construction workers in the city and suburbs.

Mr. Gravano and Mr. D'Arco both pleaded guilty to separate racketeering and murder charges in 1991 and are in the Federal Witness Protection Program. Mr. Gravano described the scheme in an affidavit in the lawsuit and Mr. D'Arco's version is detailed in the F.B.I. report.

$8,000 in Stock

Mr. Devine, who is a defendant in the suit, said in a deposition that in 1986 he had bought more than $8,000 in publicly traded stock in the Ross Company, but he denied that the investment was a conflict of interest with his union activities at Local 1456. He was elected in 1991 to the higher post of president of the District Council with an annual salary and expenses of $218,000.

Calling Mr. Gravano's and Mr. D'Arco's statements "baloney" and "lies," George L. Santangelo, a lawyer for Mr. Devine, said the local had legally acquired the union jurisdiction for the highway work by the Picone Company. "Nobody pushed Freddy around and nobody had improper influence over the local," Mr. Santangelo said.

After carpenters were hired in May 1989 by the Picone Company, members of the International Association of Bridge and Structural Ironworkers, Local 40, claiming union jurisdiction, picketed to stop the project. That is when the Gambino family was brought into the pact, Mr. Gravano said.

Mr. Gravano has told the F.B.I. that in 1989 he exercised control over Ironworkers Local 40, law-enforcement officials said. Mr. Gravano said he was urged by Mr. Casso, the Lucchese underboss, "to intervene" with the ironworkers.

Picketing Stops

After two weeks of demonstrations, Local 40 stopped picketing on May 23, 1989. Ray Mullet, the business manager and spokesman for Local 40, did not return calls seeking comment on Mr. Gravano's assertions.

Robert Morvillo, a lawyer for John Picone, the president of the Picone Company, denied that the company had committed any wrongdoing in the highway job.

Since 1979, the Picone Company has been given $290 million in contracts by the city, and since 1987, $287 million by the state. City Comptroller Elizabeth Holtzman has asked the state to rescind a $51 million award to the company in October for the construction of the Oak Point freight railroad link in the South Bronx.

But David Murray, a State Transportation Department spokesman, said that the agency could not disqualify Picone unless it was indicted or convicted in a crime and that the company has denied that it is under criminal investigation.

"We still judge Picone to be the responsible low bidder on Oak Point," he added.

What to Do With the Central Park Reservoir

Last week was a big week for Central Park. The park's 843 acres just sat there, of course, but New York City officials announced projects that will carry the park into the 21st century.

On Friday Mayor David N. Dinkins announced a $51 million restoration plan that will include replanting the Great Lawn. Everything from bridges to bridle paths on the west side of the park will also get a touching-up.

A third of the money will come from Richard Gilder, a stockbroker who runs in the park every day. There is a catch: the city and the nonprofit Central Park Conservancy must raise the rest.

On Wednesday the Dinkins administration also said that it planned to decommission the reservoir. That could lead to a debate about what to do with 106 acres of the park. Should the city call in Christo, the artist who once wrapped pink polypropylene fabric around islands in Biscayne Bay off Miami? Send for Peter Max, who built an eye-popping monument for the World's Fair in Spain last year?

If nothing else, this sampling of what they are saying suggests that things have not changed much since the English novelist Anthony Trollope wrote in the mid-19th century that "the glory of New York is the Central Park." He continued, "It does not do to say that it is fine, grand, beautiful and miraculous. You must swear that it is more fine, more grand, more beautiful, more miraculous than anything else of the kind anywhere."

Environmentalist arrested in 1986 for picking edible plants in Central Park

Leave some of the water, put in some wetlands and thickets. You can create a very beautiful natural area. The insects will come in. You'll get a thriving ecosystem. There's enough room that people should still be able to run through the periphery. Either leave the jogging path the way it is or create an equivalent. Playgrounds and recreation stuff, I think they have enough. Along the jogging path there are fruit trees called the serviceberry or the Juneberry. Better than any berry you can buy in the store.

Adam Clayton Powell

City Council member

I tell you, I jog there every morning. Keep the water. One of the proposals, it's stupid, it's ridiculous: drain it and make ballfields. There are ballfields all over the city — not enough, but there are never enough of anything in the city. But a water park? I can see so many people swimming, they bump into each other.

Warner Leroy

Owner, Tavern on the Green

I haven't thought about it a lot, but it seems to me it would be wonderful to turn it into a lake with fishing and boating and perhaps some islands. We can always use water in the city. I'd build another great restaurant on the shore, but the one thing they said is no private development. If they change their minds. . . .

Gordon J. Davis

Former Parks Commissioner

Nothing's ever going to happen. Assuming the engineering issues can be dealt with, my inclination is to pursue this course: it should remain a wonderful large water feature, but perhaps more accessible in the way the lake is. I'm not sure a beach is a good idea.

Suzy Rose

Upper East Side resident

I don't want anything changed. I don't want any islands. I bought this apartment 27 years ago, and I stayed in New York City for the peace and beauty that that view brings me.

There's something that frees the mind and the soul to look at water. There's an endlessness to the water when you look at the river from the West Side Highway. But this is serene, it's inspiring and it replenishes the soul and the psyche. It really does. I play my piano right in my living room looking at the trees and that water. I'm humbled by the beauty and serenity.

Tom Chiusano

General manager, WXRK-FM, a sponsor of the annual "Reservoir Run"

Why give it up? I kind of like the way it is. I used to run around the reservoir a lot. Heading downtown on the track, it's fabulous. I used to think about "Marathon Man." I think there's a scene where Sir Laurence was drilling Dustin Hoffman's teeth.

Richard Cohen

Commissioner, Broadway Show softball league

I think they should fill it in. The only thing that happens with water is people fall through the ice in the winter. If they divide it, half ballfields and half public use, they would really be doing a public service to ballplayers. It's an enormous space and they should be able to work something out for everybody. But I think I'll be dead and buried and there will still be water in that thing, and I intend to be around a few more years.

Gus DeStefano

Doorman, 257 Central Park West

We can't keep it the way it is? Water would be better than grass and flowers. We have enough of that in the park. Around the Eldorado — I was there from 1959 to 1970 — they really have the views from those apartments. Quite lovely. But leave the water.

William H. Whyte

Urban Sociologist

I would vote for water. It seems to me that's a more precious commodity. But I woudn't want to be dogmatic and come out and say the reservoir should be done a certain way.

Allen Steinfeld

President, New York Road Runners Club

Retain the running track. It's special. It's great for your knees, and at all hours of the day, it's totally traffic-free.

Donald J. Trump

Developer

Keep it as a reservoir or certainly as a lake. From the beauty standpoint, it's important. But anything active would be preferable to what you have now. I'd like to see it stay a water resource. You don't need more ice skating. The Wollman rink is handling that beautifully. Swimming would be wonderful, but then you'll have 50 people starting to sue the city if it wasn't perfect.

Firefighters to Rescue? A Plan Hits Snags

By JONATHAN P. HICKS

Three years ago, as part of his Safe Streets, Safe City program, Mayor David N. Dinkins announced a plan common in many cities: to send firefighters to some critical emergencies, like heart attacks, to which Emergency Medical Service workers had responded exclusively.

To proponents of the plan the logic was inescapable. The Fire Department, they reasoned, could respond more quickly to such emergencies, and with the number of fires declining over the years, the plan would help relieve the workload on the ambulance service.

But now, nearly a year after a pilot program was begun in Brooklyn, the Mayor's plan has languished in a flurry of discord and opposition from the unions representing the firefighters and the Emergency Medical Service workers. And it appears no closer to being enacted than when it was first announced.

The difficulty the Dinkins administration has had in instituting the plan underscores the huge problem of making changes in longstanding municipal working arrangements in New York City. And it shows how tricky it can be to get things done in a city government mired in turf battles between municipal departments and labor unions.

"It is a perfect issue to use as a case study to show how hard it is for New York City to make decisions and get things off the ground," said Robert F. Wagner Jr., chairman of a government monitoring group, the Citizens Union.

Although several other cities, like Houston, San Diego and Pittsburgh, share emergency-response duties, leaders of the unions involved in the issue in New York are not convinced of its merits.

"Our union's position is that E.M.S. should do medical calls and the Fire Department should do fire suppression," said Richard H. Gutwirth, president of Local 2507 of District Council 37 of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, which represents the ambulance workers.

Charles J. Bohan, secretary of the Uniformed Firefighters Association, said: "Our members did not sign up to be firefighters with the expectation of doing that kind of work. We don't want to do their job."

Best Use of Money?

Both Mr. Bohan and Mr. Gutwirth contend that the $2.3 million to train the firefighters would be better spent on new ambulances and additional ambulance workers.

The Dinkins administration counters that the plan would save lives by cutting by a minute or two the emergency response time, a critical factor in the survival of heart attack victims and people who have stopped breathing.

Training began early last year in Brooklyn, with firefighters learning cardiopulmonary resuscitation and studying techniques for handling heart-attack victims. "We had a few initial snags, but the program generally went well," said Katherine N. Lapp, special counsel to the Deputy Mayor for Public Safety.

But the firefighters became concerned that if they had to respond to other types of cases, say a gunshot victim, they might come in contact with blood, something they believed they were not properly trained for. Blood-transmitted infection, particularly of H.I.V., the virus that causes AIDS, is a big concern for people who deal with medical emergencies.

Concerns About Bleeding

The firefighters union has filed complaints with the state Department of Labor. The first complaint was that the CPR training had been inadequate. That was followed by complaints that there were too many distractions in the fire stations for the training to be effective.

Then came a complaint that the training did not conform with newly adopted Federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration standards — also adopted by the state — in dealing with blood. The union also charged that provisions for laundering firefighters' clothing splattered by blood were insufficient.

The Dinkins administration suspended the program temporarily so the Fire Department could review it. At the end of last year, the state's Labor Department ruled that the training on the handling of bleeding patients had been inadequate. After modifications were made, the city went back to the fire companies to begin retraining.

For the moment, the training continues and the Dinkins administration is seeking to restore the pilot program in Brooklyn. But the firefighters union has balked, expressing doubts that even the revised program will be adequate. So city officials have asked the Labor Department to review the course.

"If the Labor Department finds that our current training program is adequate, we would like to continue the pilot program with the idea of expanding it," Ms. Lapp said. But what if it finds that the training program is still inadequate? "Then we'll have no choice but to go back and fix it some more," she said.

Leaders of the firefighters union complain that the program was poorly structured from the beginning. Mr. Bohan said that CPR training in station houses was wedged between the time firefighters had to clean equipment or go out on fire calls.

The perils of changing municipal working practices.

After the training process was modified, Mr. Bohan said, there were still problems. "While the firefighters were trainfng away from the stations there was no backup for real fire emergencies," he said. "The people who pay us were underprotected."

Mr. Bohan complained that the Dinkins administration's program was nothing more than "a cost-saving, corner-cutting idea that's supposed to give the illusion of the city being prudent."

Meanwhile, the firefighters union, which has worked since November 1990 without a contract and is immersed in tense contract talks with the city, said its members were reluctant to participate in any emergency service work without additional pay. That suggestion is unlikely to gain a sympathetic ear from a Mayor who is weighing service cuts to balance the budget for the next fiscal year.

Issue From 1970's

The idea of using firefighters on emergency medical calls surfaced in the early 1970's, in the administration of former Mayor John V. Lindsay. In recent years, such a plan has been vigorously championed by Andrew J. Stein, the City Council President.

How soon it might be enacted is unclear. City officials contend that they are determined to institute a plan to use firefighters to do emergency medical work no matter how long it takes. "We want to bring the program back up," Ms. Lapp said. "And we fully intend to make this happen and we believe it will happen."

Mr. Bohan said: "Will this thing happen in this town? Probably not."

Mr. Wagner, the Citizens Union chairman, was somewhat more philosophical. "If history is any guide, it seems that this program may not happen," he said. "But more than anything, it says this is a complex government with complicated players."

New York Traffic Deaths Say a Lot About the City

still a crime, carrying a fine of only $2 but the possibility, at least, of arrest for failing to answer the summons.)

"The city fathers seem to treat this as if it's some act of God, something they have no control over," said Charles Komanoff, a transportation analyst and frequent critic of city policy, of the death toll.

The problem, he said, is that tickets for reckless driving in the five boroughs are rare. Unless otherwise posted, the speed limit on city streets is 30 miles per hour. It is a limit, Mr. Komanoff said, that drivers routinely ignore without much fear of tickets, in part because speed enforcement is mostly on highways.

Mr. Komanoff cited studies showing that in car-pedestrian collisions, the chance of death rises very sharply as speed increases. Speed bumps, strict enforcement of speed laws and higher tolls and taxes that cut the use of cars would reduce the pedestrian fatality rate, he said.

Increase in Enforcement

But city officials do not like the idea of speed bumps, because hitting them at a high speed can cause a driver to lose control.

As for enforcement, Mario A. Selvaggi, the Chief of Patrol in the New York City Police Department, said in an interview that his department had issued 1.53 million tickets in 1992, up from 1.46 million in 1991, and that the number would be higher this year.

A year ago the department gave borough commands their own radar equipment for use on accident-prone boulevards, like the Grand Concourse in the Bronx and Eastern Parkway in Brooklyn. In the last nine months of 1992 they issued 6,500 speeding tickets, he said.

On Friday, in response to recent accidents, the department began using special task forces on Queens Boulevard, Eastern Parkway and the Grand Concourse to stop speeders and people with broken headlights, bad tires or expired inspections. Two tours of 60 officers each will work on those arteries, he said.

Many Citations Ignored

Citywide the leading categories for tickets last year were failing to stop for a signal (300,000), driving without a license (289,000), speeding (100,000) and driving without a current inspection certificate (81,000).

The problem, Chief Selvaggi said, was that the tickets weredecriminalized, in an effort to unclog the courts.

Now that the violations are civil, he said, no warrants may be issued and one-quarter of the citations are ignored. He said the situation invited "contempt for the law."

Just last week the police created an exception to that rule; if they stop someone whose license has been suspended twice, they will arrest the driver. But only about a quarter of the police cars have the computer link-up to check on licenses.

Traffic safety in New York tends to come to public attention when an unlicensed driver hits a child in a stroller. But statistics and safety officials paint a different, sometimes surprising picture.

Dangerous to be 80

Nationally, most traffic deaths occur on the open highways, but in New York, where half the deaths are of pedestrians, the dangerous places are the "signalized wide arterial streets," places like the Grand Concourse and Queens Boulevard, even though such routes comprise only a quarter of the city's street and highway network.

Unlicensed drivers are indeed a problem; of the 574 fatal crashes in 1991, the last year for which a complete statistical breakdown has been completed, 95 involved drivers who could not present a license at the time of the accident, although some of those may have simply forgotten their wallets.

But the victims are not the young; of the 296 pedestrians killed in 1991, the largest number, 55, were people in their 80's. There were 13 fatalities among children under 10.

Overall, people 65 or older account for about 41 percent of the pedestrian deaths, although they are only 13 percent of the city's population, according to the city.

Even so, traffic safety in New York is improving. Total deaths in 1992 fell to 570, versus 609 the year before and 691 in 1990.

Although no one can completely explain the drop, which mirrors a national trend, city officials credit their grab bag of strategies. These include everything from a poster contest for elementary students and senior citizens stressing traffic safety, to shortening the interval between lane-marker stripes, giving drivers the subliminal illusion that they are going faster than they really are.

Contrasting Yardsticks

Last year the Department of Transportation also changed the road signs on the Grand Concourse, removing some exit numbers, because numbered exits gave the feeling that the place was a highway, according to Joseph DePlasco, a spokesman.

The death trend in New York zigs and zags but has been generally down since the early 1970's, when the toll for drivers, passengers and pedestrians neared 1,000. The peak year was 1929, when Model T Fords and other cars of that era killed 1,360 people.

How New York stacks up nationally depends on the measure. The National Highway Transportation Safety Board calculates the traffic fatalities per 100,000 population, and that makes New York look good, at two thirds of Los Angeles's rate and one half of Houston's. But it ought to, considering most people use mass transit to getto work.

A more sophisticated yardstick is the number of people who die per 100 million miles driven, the ratio that the Federal Government uses to measure safety. The national rate is 1.8 deaths per 100 million vehicle miles. The city calculates the national urban rate at 1.5, which is not surprising, and its own 1991 rate at 3.4.

Letting Friends Walk Drunk

Among other big cities around the country, only Boston and Baltimore share with New York the casualty ratio of one pedestrian for each driver or car passenger.

While pedestrians are obviously vulnerable, the problem is not always where one might expect. If alcohol or drugs were involved, chances are very good that the one under the influence was the pedestrian.

This is not unique to New York; nationally in 1991, when there were 5,771 fatal pedestrian crashes, 32.7 percent of pedestrian victims were intoxicated, compared with 16.9 percent of the drivers, according to the National Highway Traffic Safety Administration. In 7.8 percent of the cases, both were drunk.

New York's statistics are similar. "We have a significant drunk walking problem," Mr. Friedman said.

Chief Selvaggi said hardly anyone is arrested for public intoxication unless the person is creating a public nuisance.

But Mr. Komanoff, the transportation analyst, said there may be less to the statistic than meets the eye.

"What they ought to be doing is analyzing position and behavior," Mr. Komanoff said of the pedestrian fatalities. "If the pedestrian was lying in the middle of the Grand Concourse, that does exculpate the driver." But, he said, if someone has "one drink too many and was teetering on the sidewalk, that doesn't."

New York is accident-prone for other reasons, too. Mr. Friedman said that the streets were simply filled with too many distractions for pedestrians and drivers. There is also the pent-up frustration of a driver in crosstown gridlock who suddenly sees a few inches of daylight and takes off like a running back on the gridiron who suddenly spots a crack in the defensive line.

And there are other problems. Nationally, pedestrians get killed while crossing the street or waiting at the curb. In New York about 3 percent of the fatalities were lying in the road before they were hit.

Nationally, children are taught to cross streets at the corners. In New York, the "Cross at the Green, Not In Between" campaign familiar to generations of schoolchildren has been dropped because of drug dealers who congregate on the corners. Now the emphasis is on teaching children how to cross safely at midblock.

Woman Dies and 2 Others Hurt On Brooklyn and Queens Streets

Cars struck three pedestrians crossing streets in Queens and Brooklyn in a two-and-a-half-hour-period Friday evening, the police said yesterday. One woman died and two other people were listed in critical condition at local hospitals as a result of the accidents.

Earlier in the day, the police and prosecutors said they were considering seeking warrants against 700 drivers whose licenses have been suspended at least 50 times. The warrants would allow the authorities to arrest the drivers and force them to appear in court.

The woman who died, Betty Blocker, 59 years old, of 1239 Stanley Avenue in East New York, Brooklyn, was trying to cross Linden Boulevard near Eldert Lane about 8:30 P.M. when she was struck by a car driven by Tanya Pettiford, 25, of 245 Wortman Avenue in East New York, said a police spokesman, Sgt. Anthony Barlanti.

In an accident in Bushwick, Brooklyn, a man walked in front of a driver, said Police Officer Scott Bloch, a spokesman. The accident occurred at 6 P.M. on Bushwick Avenue near Schaffer Avenue when a 34-year-old man was hit by a limousine driven Robert Wallace, 64, Officer Bloch said.

In a third incident, a 16-year-old Queens woman was in critical conditon at Jamaica Hospital after she was struck by a hit-and-run driver at 8:55 P.M. as she tried to cross Atlantic Avenue near Woodhaven Boulevard in Richmond Hill.

Driver Is Charged in Crash

An emergency medical technician whose driver's license has been suspended seven times was arrested yesterday after he was involved in an accident while he was driving an ambulance on the way to an emergency call in Jamaica, Queens, the police said. The technician, Ketlair Lefontant, 27, of 475 Rye Street in Elmont, L.I., was charged with driving without a license, said a police spokesman, Officer Scott Bloch.

For Korean Immigrants, America Is Land of Golf

They Find a Luxury Can Be Obtained

By DOUGLAS MARTIN

Shouts of "Gong!" — Korean for "Fore!" — echoed across the damp, verdant fairways of the Great Gorge Country Club near McAfee, N.J., as clusters of grocers attacked the course from a half-dozen separate starting tees.

"It's called shotgun play," said Myong Y. Juch, president of the Korean-American Grocers Association of New York. "We can start and finish at the same time and save almost two hours." Although shotgun play is commonly used so all the players in a tournament can start at the same time, the technique seemed particularly fitting to these golfers, who approached the game with aggressive enthusiasm.

Thursday marked the group's third tournament, and intermittent rain was no obstacle to the practical, nonsense, time-is-money participants. The grocers relaxed with the same directed vigor with which most work 12- or 14-hour days running the stores that have altered the face of New York and other cities.

Little matter that many of the 105 players will never shatter 100, much less par. They scrutinized maps of each hole as if scouting a military operation, lined up their shots like the touring pros they had seen on television, then protested as physics exacted its often cruel course.

An exemplary effort, however, uniformly drew the following comment, "Nice shot."

An American Luxury

Golf's attraction for Koreans lies partly in the fact that it was so out of reach in the old country. Participants recalled that country club memberships cost $50,000 in Seoul, when available at all. Greens fees commonly exceed $100 there, and caddies are mandatory at as much as $50 before tip.

"Some people came over here to play golf," said K. D. Hwang, who lives in New Jersey and owns a store in Manhattan.

In the New York area, some said, they play as often as once a week, sometimes beginning at 5 A.M. Many said they most often play with fellow grocers, discussing such business topics as prices, insurance and taxes.

The day of golf was supported by many of the food and beverage distributors who have come to realize the importance of Korean grocers in the city's economy. Marketing people from Anheuser-Busch, Coca-Cola, R.J. Reynolds, Apple & Eve fruit juices and several milk companies were among those dropping by to give money for entry fees and convey goodwill.

Indeed, a 30-foot-high inflatable can of Bud Lite commanded a prominent position, while many grocers wore bright yellow raincoats touting Camel cigarettes.

"The Korean grocers are hugely important," declared Phil Birnbaum of Anheuser-Busch.

Of late, political talk has been markedly increasing. One topic is the recent verdict in the Rodney King case in Los Angeles. Just as Korean merchants there feared they might be the victims of rioters if the policemen accused of violating Mr. King's civil rights had been acquitted, New York's Korean grocers heaved sighs of relief. "Some people blame Korean grocers for everything," Mr. Juch said.

The president characterized his members as an increasingly sophisticated group, no longer content to be "buttered up by politicians who tell us how hard we work and how smart our kids are."

He said that every mayoral candidate had met with the grocers' group and that soon each would be presented with a list of specific demands. The list, he said, will include reductions in commercial rent taxes, an easing of the issuance of sanitation tickets and a crackdown on illegal vendors.

In particular, he wants tax abatements on four buildings that the association is buying in Long Island City, Queens, to form a wholesalers' cooperative to sell to retail stores. The buildings are being purchased by the Korean Trade Development Corporation, a Korean Government agency, which in turn will rent the 100,000 square feet of space to the association. Korea hopes to use the co-op as a means to get more Korean exports into Korean groceries.

Mr. Juch emphasized that the heightened movement into politics of his membership as well as the more sophisticated approach to business planning represented by the co-op dramatize the growing sophistication of Koreans in the grocery business here. He said a survey indicated they average 42.5 years of age, have been in the United States for 7.5 years, have been in business 3 years and are considerably more affluent than their predecessors.

"Nowadays, they come with a bunch of money," he said, often through selling their home in Korea for $300,000 or more. "Ten or 15 years ago, you would hear stories of people starting out with $10 or $20, but no more."

Their business acumen is undeniable, say wholesalers and others. The grocers say few stores close, except for retirement or to move into a better location. Peter Spinella, Coca-Cola's director of special markets, agreed, saying, "They drive a hard bargain."

Some of the bargains have been to help improve often tattered relations with people in the poorer communities that many Korean grocers serve. On Tuesday at Hunter College they will join with Coca-Cola to present five black students with $2,000 scholarships. Anheuser-Busch gives $15,000 in scholarships to equal numbers of Korean and black students.

But golf took precedence on Thursday, as rain became sun. "This is comfortable," Sang M. Lee said. "Business is 24 hours sometimes, and this gives you time to yourself."

Mr. Lee's brother, Sang Hyun Lee, who works in the same store at 53d Street and Second Avenue, agreed that golf was his biggest relaxation, then proceeded to demonstrate why. He whacked a nine-iron shot high into the air, then watched it land four feet from the flag. "That's why people come back," he said with a tickled grin. "Just for the one great shot."

They might also come back for the awards. Anheuser-Busch presented 17 trophies, all waist-high and gleaming. Others were given 21 impressive golf bags. The person with the nearest shot to the hole on No. 6 won a round-trip plane ticket to Seoul. Everybody not yet awarded something was asked to raise his hand and presented with gift certificates for Korean food.

One of the trophies was won by Mr. Juch's wife, Chung, one of four women to participate. "If I hadn't invited her, she'd be working at the store today," an ebullient Mr. Juch said in presenting the award. "A lucky lady."

Reward Money Goes To Honor Victim

KINGSTON, N.Y., May 8 (AP) — A woman who received $10,000 for giving the police information that led to the arrest and conviction of three suspects in a woman's killing says she will donate some of the money to the victim's alma mater.

"Frankly, I'm not comfortable benefiting from someone's death so I wanted to give some of it to people who needed it more than we do," said Joan Cosme, 28, of New Britain, Conn.

The state police and Thruway officials announced on Friday that Ms. Cosme gave them the lead that led to the conviction of three men in the death of Karen Zentner, 22, of Stone Ridge. Ms. Zentner died instantly when a 52-pound rock, thrown from an overpass, crashed through her windshield while she was driving along the New York State Thruway on April 21, 1991.

Ms. Cosme said a family friend told her "he knew who did it," but he was reluctant to call the police, so she did.

Ms. Cosme said she would give at least $1,500 of the reward money to Ulster County Community College in Ms. Zentner's name and about $1,000 to other charities.

Man Pleads Not Guilty in Hotel Strangling

By The Associated Press

A man accused of using pantyhose to strangle his girlfriend to death in a Manhattan hotel claims she died during rough sex. Gerald Ardito, 34 years old, pleaded not guilty on Friday to second-degree murder in the death of Marie Daniele, 24, of Brooklyn.

Mr. Ardito was arrested on Wednesday and was jailed without bail in connection with the strangulation of Ms. Daniele on April 28.

Mr. Ardito's lawyer, James LaRossa, called the killing "a terrible tragedy." Assistant District Attorney Harvey Rosen said the killing did not appear to be accidental. He said Ms. Daniele died after being strangled for three to five minutes.

Mr. Rosen also said that Mr. Ardito had attacked and tried to strangle Ms. Daniele in February in the hallway outside his apartment. Neighbors heard the woman screaming, rescued her and called the police. Ms. Daniele refused to press charges.

The police said Mr. Ardito and Ms. Daniele had been engaged but she broke it off about three months ago.

Mr. Rosen said that after the woman passed out in a room on the 34th floor of the Grand Hyatt Hotel, Mr. Ardito did not call for medical help.

IF THE PROBLEMS WITH BREAST IMPLANTS CONCERN YOU...

The FDA has recently restricted severely the sale of all silicone breast implants until the safety of all such implants on the market can be guaranteed. A number of manufacturers of silicone breast implants have ceased selling and manufacturing implants altogether.

Some implants clearly pose greater risk than others. Understanding those risks is important to both your continued health and well being as well as your state of mind.

Health problems linked to defective implants include autoimmune disease, thyroid problems, sclerosis, mixed connective tissue disease, Sjogren's syndrome, unnatural breast hardness and related pain, disfigurement, and a possible link to cancer.

Symptoms commonly found in women with health problems related to silicone are chronic fatigue, dry eyes, dry mouth, muscle weakness, cognitive dysfunction, arthralgia, photosensitivity, Raynaud's phenomena, easy bruisability, rashes and sleep disturbance.

If you have had medical problems from breast implants you may be entitled to compensation for your injuries. If you find yourself in this situation and need experienced legal advice, or would just like more information, we're here to both allay fears of uncertainty and help you make the right decision.

NEW YORK STATE

Finding Death, Pain And Community Spirit

With Celebrity, a Narrow World Widens

By MELINDA HENNEBERGER
Special to The New York Times

MUNNSVILLE, N.Y., May 5 — Delbert, Roscoe and Lyman Ward still live in the ramshackle farmhouse where their brother William was found dead in his bed three years ago next month.

But the world has expanded considerably since then for the surviving brothers, three dairy farmers who had kept to themselves for decades, never socializing or traveling any farther than their tractor could take them. And while much of what they have lately seen of life has been painful, their loss has also led to a late and unexpected blossoming for "the boys," as they've always been called here though they're now on the cusp of old age.

When Delbert Ward, now 62, was charged with murder in his brother's death, townspeople who had never exchanged a word with him rallied around, raising $10,000 for his bail in a single day. They accused the police of coercing a confession from a man too simple to know what rights he was waiving, and too meek to kill anyone — even if, as the police said, his intention had been to end his ailing brother's suffering. Delbert couldn't so much as bear to give his cows their shots, they said; how could he have suffocated his own brother?

A Cause Célèbre

Delbert, who left school in the 6th grade to work the farm after his father died of cancer, became a local cause célèbre, forced out of isolation along with his unwilling brothers. Reporters came to interview them all, initially drawing only "yep" and "nope" answers from Delbert and Roscoe, now 73, and usually prompting a hasty exit by Lyman, 69, who was so shy he used to wait for his brothers outside the coffee shop in town where they went for breakfast every morning by tractor, since none of them had a license to drive a car.

Slowly, over time, they warmed to the attention of their newfound friends, including two young New York filmmakers, Bruce Sinofsky and Joe Berlinger, who spent nine months making "Brother's Keeper," a documentary about them.

Since Delbert was acquitted in the summer of 1991, he has done a number of things he'd never done before, like trying Chinese food and even riding to Florida with his longtime friend and neighbor, Harry Thurston. And since the movie was released last September, the Wards' friends say, they have surely talked more than in the previous half-century.

Delbert and Roscoe have traveled with the filmmakers to 15 film openings in upstate New York, where Mr. Berlinger says they usually stand in the back, eating popcorn and talking along with themselves when they appear on-screen. Afterward, they shake hands and sign autographs for fans of the film, which even without a Hollywood distributor has become one of the most successful documentaries ever made. Even shy Lyman is weighing an appearance in New York when the film returns to the city for showings at the Village East Theaters on May 14.

Enjoy Having Company

At home on their farm, about midway between Syracuse and Utica in central New York, the batchelor brothers come outside one by one at the sound of a car. Each man wears a red promotional button that says, "Am I My Brother's Keeper?" While they don't say a lot, they seem to enjoy having company, sitting in their yard, chewing tobacco, and talking. Lyman even offers a tour of the barn where they keep their 32 cows, pointing out a calf born the day before, and a cow with no tail that gives weak milk.

Conversation is a group effort, with Roscoe leading the way, periodically asking, "Isn't that right, Delbert?" When Lyman cracks a joke, it is shared with a pleasure that seems to have been stored up for a very long time.

They point out everything that appeared in the film, which is a central point of reference now. "The red tractor from the 'Brother's Keeper' movie won't run no more," Lyman says, pointing to the discarded machinery parked in the yard. "We got a new tractor now."

After a while, Delbert asks, "Do you like to walk?" and leads the way past a shed where the brothers keep an old buggy that a man once offered to buy for $2,000. But they never heard from him again, and "we figured he must have passed away," Delbert says, strolling on to the top of the hay pasture, which offers a view of rolling hills. "I used to come up here and watch them set off firecrackers," he says quietly.

Their daily routine on the farm hasn't changed so much, except for missing their brother Bill, who had unofficially been the head of the household since their mother died on Valentine's Day in 1965. Bill's name comes up every few minutes.

They have disconnected the phone that the filmmakers installed, and they haven't repaired the indoor plumbing since the pipes froze last winter. Neither their housekeeping nor their hygiene seems to have improved, though they shave and slick up a bit for their theater appearances. "The house is just three years dirtier," Mr. Sinofsky noted in an interview.

Michael J. Okoniewski for The New York Times

Delbert, foreground, Roscoe, right, and Lyman Ward on their farm in Munnsville, N.Y. They are the subject of a critically-acclaimed documentary film about the killing of their brother, William, three years ago. Delbert, who was charged with murder, was acquitted in 1991.

Forced from isolation, three brothers blossom.

But life is full of surprises now, and new places and people. "They've been in other people's homes and had dinner and seen how the other half lives," said Mr. Sinofsky, who along with Mr. Beringer stays in contact weekly with the Wards. "To feel something for people, to be hugged and liked, has expanded their emotions. They have a wider life than they had before."

Delbert says: "I like to get out and see different stuff." Lots of people who have seen the movie come to see them, too. A couple on vacation from England drove more than 150 miles from Niagara Falls to say hello, and the brothers all thought that was nice.

The three also visited New York City for the first time, and thought it was noisy. But they complain like people who have had a really good time. They took a ride on the Staten Island Ferry and ate ice cream in Central Park. They even ordered room service at their hotel.

"I'll tell you a good one," Roscoe says. "In New York City, we saw women with not so much as a pair of socks on."

The brothers would rather not return to New York for their film's second run next week, "but if I didn't make it, the boys wouldn't be very happy," Roscoe says, referring to the filmmakers.

And the truth is, the Wards have changed many of their new friends almost as much as they have been changed by them.

In Munnsville, population 499, the experience of coming together to help the Wards was something that everyone seems intensely proud of.

The walls of the town's central meeting place, the Pizza Shack, are covered by a "Brother's Keeper" movie poster and articles with headlines like, "Neighbors Support Murder Suspect," and, "Villagers Rally for Murder Suspect."

After the critical acclaim of the low-budget movie, Mr. Sinofsky said he and his partner "have agents now, and people interested in doing projects with us." And like the Ward brothers, he said, the filmmakers can't help but notice that "people are talking to us that wouldn't talk to us last year."

NEW JERSEY

A Rarity Tries to Repeat as Mayor in Jersey City

By JOSEPH F. SULLIVAN
Special to The New York Times

JERSEY CITY, May 7 — Something seems amiss in this bastion of Democratic Party politics. A Republican is sitting in the mayor's office and he does not want to leave.

True, Mayor Bret Schundler was once a Democrat who worked for Gary Hart's presidential campaign, but for the last few years he has been a registered Republican.

Since defeating 18 rivals in a special election five months ago, he has been the chief executive of a city that has only 4,911 registered Republicans, compared with 46,287 registered Democrats, and about 36,000 voters who are not affiliated with either major party.

That is why his chief rival is urging residents to "Vote Democratic" in the municipal election Tuesday, even though the city's government is nonpartisan and there are no Republican or Democratic columns on the ballot.

Looking for the Party Label

Louis Manzo, 38, a Hudson County Freeholder running against Mr. Schundler, said he was appealing to the city's Democratic soul to remind voters "how the urban areas suffered under 12 years of Republican rule by Reagan and Bush." Mr. Manzo finished second in November's special election, called after Mayor Gerald McCann went to prison on a Federal extortion conviction.

Mr. Manzo's idea seems to be to invite voters to picture the city's and state's most powerful Democratic political boss, the late Frank (I am the law) Hague, who ruled for three decades into the 1940's, spinning in his grave at the idea of a Republican sitting at his desk.

Mr. Schundler, 34, a former Wall Street investment counselor, tries to blunt this tactic by pointing out that he has Democratic running mates for the nine council seats that will also be filled Tuesday.

In any case, Mr. Schundler said his campaign polls show that residents are not looking at party labels and will make up their minds on bedrock issues like taxes, crime and jobs.

Possibility of a Runoff

His polls also convince the Mayor he will win a first-ballot victory. To do so he must capture more than 50 percent of the total vote, defeating Mr. Manzo and a third candidate, City Councilman Daniel Waddleton, 51. If no candidate receives that much, there will be a runoff election June 15.

With a week to go, Mr. Manzo conceded he was trailing the Mayor, but said, "We've cut his lead down to single digits." Mr. Waddleton, who will spend only about a tenth of the $400,000 to $600,000 being spent by his opponents, said there would be a runoff and he would be in it.

Both Mr. Schundler and Mr. Manzo strongly promote community policing, which puts more police on foot patrol and gives neighborhood groups the ability to assist the police by reporting problems or suspicious activity. Mr. Schundler has put 50 more police officers on foot patrol and said 87 more will be added soon. He said designated neighborhood leaders may even be given police radios.

All three candidates propose a major refurbishing of the city's parks and recreation systems. Mr. Manzo also wants to create a Youth Conservation Corps to work on the improvements, while Mr. Waddleton, a former nationally ranked high school basketball player, plans to revive the city's department of recreation.

Mr. Waddleton, a teacher and alcohol and drug abuse counselor, also proposes establishing centers affiliated with hospitals to treat teens for drug and alcohol abuse.

But the issue that has become the focus of much of the campaign is Mr. Schundler's novel plan to raise about $20 million in each of the next two years by bundling the city's tax liens and selling them to investors.

A bill authorizing Jersey City to use the technique passed both houses of the Legislature Thursday. Gov. Jim Florio had sent a previous bill back to the Legislature for amendments aimed at protecting tenants from eviction if the ownership of their apartment houses changed through the lien sales. He has promised to sign the amended bill.

A Focus on Renters

Mr. Schundler said that besides the lien sale, the city was trying to reduce tax rates by improving tax collections. At present, the city collects only about 80 percent of the taxes owed by property owners.

Mr. Manzo calls the Mayor's plan a "pie in the sky" and has tried to capitalize on fears about evictions among the city's high percentage of renters. Campaign flyers tell voters the Mayor has an "eviction hit list" of 26,000 renters on his desk and say they had better pack their bags if Mr. Schundler is re-elected.

Mr. Schundler said the Manzo campaign "has taken a bonehead assumption as fact, and is promoting fantastic flights of fancy."

Raymond Lesniak, the New Jersey Democratic Chairman, said he had been lending "moral support" to the Manzo campaign and echoed criticism of the proposed lien sale.

Accusations on Assets

"The Mayor wants to sell off city assets at a bargain, and this represents a danger to future revenues," he said. "Ever since trading in junk bonds ended with the collapse of the savings and loans, traders have been looking for some new product and they're tripping over themselves to make a killing at the expense of the people of Jersey City."

Mr. Schundler said he worried about a tactic that surfaced at the end of the 1985 mayoral election, when tenants' fears about eviction also were plumbed for political advantage. A few days before that election, phony eviction notices were shoved under the doors of nervous tenants by one of the campaigns, which helped lead to the incumbent mayor's defeat.

So one of the last Schundler campaign mailers will tell voters to ignore such notices if they see them right before the election.

LONG ISLAND

Armand D'Amato Verdict Seen as Rebuke of Politics

Navy to buy weapons systems from his client, the defense contractor Unisys, on his brother's letterhead. Mr. D'Amato has pledged to appeal the conviction, and prosecutors have said that Senator D'Amato did not know of his brother's scheme.

Closed-Door Politics

Browning-Ferris's 1983 decision to hire Mr. D'Amato and his handling of their pitch in Hempstead demonstrate how freely political and legal spheres tend to overlap in Nassau County. Winning contracts, settling disputes and deciding policy have traditionally been closed-door affairs, with public meetings largely reserved for announcing decisions. It also reveals an unspoken tenet of doing business here: whom you know can be important as what you know, and whatever you do, do it without shame.

"He's a guy who, in the last few years, made no bones about what he was doing," said one politician who spoke on the condition of anonymity. "He never came in and said I'm trying to make life better, he'd come in and say I'm trying to make money. He knows how the system works."

Indicting the System

The traditions are changing, but in the clubby world of Nassau County politics, friends and political insiders of both parties called Mr. D'Amato's conviction an unfair attack on the lawyer, an indictment more of the system that produced him than of the man himself. Here, where family and friends have long greased the political machine, they saw nothing illegal — or morally doubtful — in Mr. D'Amato using his brother's presumed political muscle to win clients.

"It's hard for me to understand what kind of crime, if any, he's committed in this matter," said Lawrence Elovich, a close friend of Senator D'Amato who has been supporting the Senator's brother. "If his name wasn't D'Amato, I don't think he'd be in this position today."

Mr. D'Amato, who had been a Republican State Assemblyman himself, stepped down in 1987 to devote himself full time to his Mineola law practice, which blossomed after his brother's election to the United States Senate in 1980.

An Office in Washington

He had started his firm with Jeffrey D. Forchelli in 1976, and watched it grow from a four-man office to one of the most powerful on Long Island. For a few months in the early 1980's, Mr. D'Amato even opened a lobbying office in Washington, a "a silly idea," Senator D'Amato later said, admitting that he was pleased when his brother decided to close the office.

The conviction of such a well-connected member of the political set mirrors a more general decline in the once legendary power of the Republican Party. Half the members of the traditionally Republican Board of Supervisors are now Democrats, and the board itself is under court order to dissolve and form a more representative county legislature.

It may be a testimony either to Mr. D'Amato's likableness, to the family's power or simply to the way relations are tended here that none of Mr. D'Amato's opponents would openly criticize him.

"Most everybody likes Armand," said Bruce Nyman, the Democratic Supervisor from Long Beach. "He's an honest, straight-shooting guy, who always told it like it is. There's no hypocrisy around him. He never pretended to be anybody he wasn't."

The few associates who spoke at all reserved their scorn for Federal prosecutors, who, they said, were building their own reputations by winning the conviction of a member of such an influential family. Noting that Mr. D'Amato's partner, Mr. Forchelli, received many of the checks from Unisys but was not indicted — testifying instead as a Government witness — they said Mr. D'Amato had been made a target because of his name.

'We've Been Complaining'

"I think there are a lot of people out there that feel the prosecutors should have indicted the whole political system, which thrives on lobbying and special interests, instead of indicting Armand D'Amato," Mr. Nyman said.

A conviction mirrors a decline in the power of the Nassau Republican Party.

"We've been complaining about the inside deals and the sweetheart contracts for years," said Benjamin L. Zwirn, the Democratic Supervisor from North Hempstead. While acknowledging that Mr. D'Amato was a "major political figure on Long Island," Mr. Zwirn said he did not expect the conviction to lead to any general reform in the political and legal practices on the island.

Nor did Mr. D'Amato's law firm, D'Amato, Forchelli, Libert, Schwartz, Mineo & Joseph F. Carlino, expect repercussions. While Mr. D'Amato could face disbarment, Donald Jay Schwartz, one of his partners, said he did not think business would fall off. "We'll move on," Mr. Schwartz said. "We believe we do quality work, and we think that's what people will come to us for."

Privately, though, other lawyers said that Mr. D'Amato's departure under the cloud of a Federal conviction, aside from causing the firm to lose some of the most high-powered clients on Long Island, could steer away new clients who might fear another law-enforcement investigation. The D'Amato name, so intricately linked to the firm's rise to prominence, appeared to be bound to its threatened downfall as well.

CITY

As Voices Emerge, a New Generation of Blacks Embraces Political Activism

guys we have to get to."

More established, older blacks who in many cases have worked on serious social problems for years, say they applaud the energy they see among younger blacks, but fear that the nature of the city's politics requires experience and hard work within the system.

While they believe some younger leaders may be able to do effective work at the grass-roots level, changing the complicated realities of city government calls for a more thorough understanding of the nuances and difficulties of running the city.

"It's like learning to sail," said Bill Lynch, campaign manager for Mayor David N. Dinkins. "First you learn to sail a Sailfish before you go out and buy a yacht."

Still, a deep sense of alienation moves from Spanish Harlem to the corridors of Columbia University.

'Patient for What?'

"Who wants to be patient? Patient for what?" asked Ms. Sharif, an irrepressibly energetic 21-year-old who grew up in a Harlem housing project and who began her activism by organizing rallies in the eighth grade to get teen-agers to stay in school. Ms. Sharif speaks of a "microwave generation" that has seen too much but learned too little. "You want crack, you can get crack just like that," she said with a snap of her fingers and a flick of her this-is-me hair that topples in cornrows from a velvet bow atop her head. "You want a gun, you can get a gun just like that. But you go to the library to get a book and you have to wait."

At a time when the National Association for the Advancement of Colored People is struggling to reshape its mission, young black men express their rage with rap and even the Rev. Jesse Jackson seems to be in search of a new cloak fit for the 1990's, many blacks are seeking a new style. Three decades after Dr. King led the nation on a quest for equal rights, there is the sense now that progress will be made only on a micro, not macro scale. With major civil rights legislation in place, the focus has turned inward and the styles of leadership have become as varied as the communities involved.

Few blacks talk seriously any longer of a single galvanizing force, one charismatic leader who will redress the imbalances of which they are all aware.

Those who choose to shape new styles of leadership also speak of a community of many parts, made up now of blacks of Caribbean, African and other heritages, each with somewhat different priorities and different needs.

The new drive for change has its roots partly in a sense of desperation shared by many in tough inner-city communities. But it was sparked, many black officials and politicians say, by a single event: Mr. Jackson's run for the White House in 1988. It was that race, many believe, that showed blacks their vast untapped political potential and started a dialogue about how best to use it.

"There is a tremendous interest in the empowerment of the community through the electoral process," said Mr. Lynch.

Larry Dais, an assistant vice president for governmental relations at Columbia University, essentially agrees. But he believes that some of the changes will be hard on the old guard, men like Mayor Dinkins, Congressman Charles B. Rangel and their protégés who represent a generation that played city politics the old-fashioned way, through connections, church contacts and late-night meetings. Younger blacks, he said, now look at those in power and ask, "What have you done with it?"

"The new generation is saying, 'Unh, unh, baby. It's accountability time,'" he said.

A Mainstream Approach

Exactly what the younger generation does with that complaint, however, is likely to be as different as the generation's many parts. Patricia Irvin, a 38-year-old lawyer with the Manhattan firm Mill, Bank & Tweed and a member of President Clinton's transition team, takes a mainstream approach. For several years now she has tapped friends in the fields of law, business and investment banking to build a network of professionals to finance and evaluate candidates as different as Mayor Dinkins and the Rev. Al Sharpton.

Others' work is more hands on. Mr. Simpson, the 31-year-old senior pastor at Brooklyn's Concord Baptist Church, said: "All of us are in this mess. This is a hell of a place to be after 12 years of cuts, after 12 years of an assault by Reagan-Bush that we are actually the problem. I have some of that rage in me."

Jim Estrin/The New York Times

Geoffrey Canada, head of the Rheedlen Centers for Children and Families, a nonprofit group that works with inner-city children. He says that he fears losing touch with the very generation he has pledged to serve.

The rage has led Mr. Simpson, whose church has a congregation of 10,000, to join with other Brooklyn church leaders to draw the younger generation back under the steeples. He has broadened church programs for younger members and even changed the church's vocabulary. "A generation ago, Malcolm X would not have been talked about," he said. "He was considered a demagogue, a hatemonger. But now, Malcolm X is raised almost to sainthood in churches. We understand that revolution is not only the vision of Martin Luther King's dream, but of Malcolm X's nightmare."

Putting Energy And Power to Use

That energy is applauded by men and women in their 40's who have worked for decades to build institutions that are now powers in their own right.

Stephen Roberson, 42, once worked with the United Farm Workers and marched alongside Huey Newton, Bobby Seale and Malcolm X. Today, as a professional organizer with the Industrial Areas Foundation, a national grass-roots advocacy group, he says he tries to build "collectives of power." One project led to the replacement of 2,000 missing Brooklyn street signs. Another prompted tougher health inspections at Harlem food stores that habitually stocked rotten meat and inferior produce. Now HIT is working to spruce up Harlem's public parks.

John H. Bess, a self-effacing but passionate 41-year-old, has followed a similar path. In 1979, he founded the Manhattan Valley Youth Program, an organization dedicated to providing direction and assistance to inner-city youth. In his first year Mr. Bess attracted $120,000 in grants. Today the group's budget is $3 million strung together from state, city and private grants. This year up to 10,000 city youth will attend everything from art classes to leadership seminars in a place that provides sanctuary from the street.

"We had a long time when the middle class hid in the Barnards and Yales and even Berkley," Mr. Bess said. "They hid and they pursued their own careers." Now, he believes, many younger blacks want to work inside their communities while seeking out an older generation for advice, support and money.

"The new warlords are trying to transmit a message, to shake up the nation and make it wake up to these inequities, these social issues that are drowning us," he said. "You saw it in L.A. You see it here. The extreme conditions of devastation that they face are going to create a new crop of leaders."

Seeing the Need To Stay in Touch

To some, such words recall the rhetoric of the 1960's, stirring, perhaps, but not entirely convincing.

Geoffrey Canada, the 41-year-old head of the Rheedlen Centers for Children and Families, a nonprofit group that works with inner-city children, is widely respected as a grass-roots activist. Yet he says he fears losing touch with the very generation he is pledged to serve.

"One of the first things that happens to leaders," he said, "is that they get pulled further and further away from their communities. You get all these calls, 'Can you do this? Can you do that? There are so few of us who control even a small amount of resources that we get pulled in a lot of directions."

Suzan D. Johnson Cook, at 36, straddles that divide. Born into a relatively well-connected family in the Bronx and inculcated in the ways of power and prestige at the Riverdale Country Day School, she now works as the senior pastor at Mariner's Temple Baptist Church in lower Manhattan.

Basil A. Paterson, the former deputy mayor and an enduring figure in the city's politics, believes the city needs more people like her and complains that many in her generation followed narrow career goals at the expense of the health of their communities. "I think it is important that we not let them get away," he said of a generation of professionals now in their 30's and 40's.

Some influential leaders are cynical about any prospect of major change. Leadership, they say, is forged the old-fashioned way — you work for it, step by step.

If nothing else, that deliberate process has made for smooth transitions and few surprises. Mr. Rangel has held his Congressional seat for nearly a quarter-century. Others with ambitions say they have carefully nurtured their own careers. "New York is still a city of connections," said Jewel Jackson McCabe, the 47-year-old educational consultant who made her way into the final round in the battle over the leadership of the N.A.A.C.P. "If you know the right person you can get anything done. If you don't, you better go meet them."

Those who try to circumvent the system, she said, are given quick comeuppance: "We kill them off. We know they won't know what they are doing out there."

Armed With Tools Of Political Action

That rough justice may no longer work. Schooled in the tactics of groups like Act Up, the AIDS advocacy group that uses shock as a political tool, and armed with the political savvy and grass-roots know-how of a generation that invented phone trees, younger blacks are devising new paths to power and sometimes literally inventing their own.

In a second-story office in the East Flatbush section of Brooklyn, Yvonne J. Graham, a 39-year-old immigrant from Jamaica, presides over the Caribbean Women's Health Association. Though she arrived in New York City only 15 years ago, she has become an astute player of city politics, building a $1.25 million-a-year health organization out of an impulse to get basic care for immigrant women. Now her group provides health care to thousands.

"I was here all on my own," she said. "And I decided, 'Hey, I have to survive!' And the survival skills I learned gave me the strength to go on. Ten years from now, she hopes to influence health care worldwide through such groups as the World Health Organization, the Pan American Health Organization and the United Nations.

Some activists, though, are still busy learning the basics. Around a table in a basement room of the St. John the Divine Cathedral at the lower cusp of Harlem, eight voices streaked in a seamless stream of sound that slid from Jamaican patois to southern belle, broad Brooklyn and the crisp diction of the upper class. The accents were mere theatrics, an overflow of energy from a roomful of young organizers. But the sentiments were serious. Concerned that their Harlem community lacked effective, reliable leadership, they were bent on becoming part of a new vanguard.

"We need some cross-generation work," said an earnest young woman at whose elbow lay a book titled "How to be Organized in Spite of Yourself" and a pile of essays on the lives of prominent African-Americans. "We need to learn from these women and see how they get things done."

That meeting of the "Circle of Sistahs" was called to help young women grapple with problems as diverse as education, job hunting and domestic violence. During a break, an intensely shy 27-year-old appeared to audition for a rap performance she hoped to perform. She was not ready for prime time. But the women clapped and offered their encouragement.

"You never know," said Ms. Sharif. "She could come back, you know, five years from now and tell us we really gave her the courage to start."

Fresh Air Fund Offers Respite From Urban Summers

As Diane Traiger drove Marcus Mitchell to the Traigers' summer home in upstate New York last summer, Marcus pointed out the window and asked, "What's that?"

"I thought he meant the power lines," Ms. Traiger said. "But he was talking about the trees. He had never seen so many trees together before."

The two-week visit with the Traigers was filled with new sights and sounds for Marcus, who had rarely left his family's neighborhood in Brooklyn before the trip. The Traigers, who live in Manhattan, had volunteered to bring a Fresh Air Fund child with them on their summer vacation.

The fund, which is entering its 117th season, will try to place more than 7,000 city children with hosts in 316 communities from Maine to Virginia. An additional 2,500 children will attend Fresh Air Fund camps in Fishkill, N.Y.

Company During Vacation

Marcus, who was 9 years old last summer, and the Traigers' son Larry, then 8, explored the area around Copake, hiking and boating. They talked about their favorite sport, baseball, taught each other bicycle tricks, and glided on in-line skates.

The Traigers had long wanted to become Fresh Air Fund hosts, which they believed would be a "win-win situation" for them. Larry would have someone to keep him company on vacation, and their guest would have a chance to leave the city for a few weeks.

"The city is a lousy place for a kid to have to spend the summer," said Warren Traiger, a lawyer who grew up in the suburbs. "Part of it may have been selfish, too: in a lot of ways, it's easier to spend a vacation with two 8-year-olds than with one 8-year-old."

But the family never expected the match to be such a success.

"We played everything. I would play with my best friend," Larry said. "In fact, he is one of my best friends now."

Year-Round Relationship

Marcus visited the Traigers again in Manhattan last summer, went to Larry's birthday party at Yankee Stadium in the fall and will spend another two weeks in Copake this summer. Last month, the Traigers introduced him to another new experience, a Passover seder.

"It was nice," Marcus said of the seder. "There were a lot of friendly people there. They helped me with the words I didn't know and told me what it means."

Before the Traigers could become a host family, they were interviewed by Fresh Air Fund volunteers in New York and in Copake. They were able to request a playmate about the same age as Larry. Marcus's mother also had the chance to express her preferences.

The Traigers needed to make sure Marcus was not afraid of dogs, since their dog, Flash, is part of the family. They also needed a child who would sleep in the top bunk, which Larry refuses to do.

There are about 35 New York families like the Traigers who bring children with them on vacation, said Jenny Morgenthau, the Fresh Air Fund's executive director. Last year, the fund began allowing families to take children for less than two weeks at a time to encourage the participation of New Yorkers who leave the city for shorter stays.

About 60 percent of Fresh Air Fund host families invite the same child back for another summer visit. But the Traigers say they are particularly lucky, because they have been able to see Marcus all year long.

Of course, everyone was a little nervous before the first meeting, but the discomfort faded quickly. Larry and Marcus noticed some differences between them, but those faded too.

Marcus started the summer being extra polite. ("His mother must have read him the riot act before he came up," Ms. Traiger theorizes.) He remained more polite than most 9-year-olds they know, but his exuberance started to take over. By Larry's birthday party, Marcus led the eight other boys to empty seats in the front row for the end of the game at Yankee Stadium.

The Traigers knew Marcus had settled into their routine a few days after he arrived. The family watched very little television, and initially Marcus talked about the shows he was missing. Soon, though, late dinners and searching for fireflies caught Marcus's fancy, and Mr. Traiger said, "He just stopped asking about the TV."

Tax-deductible contributions can be sent to the Fresh Air Fund, 1040 Avenue of the Americas, New York, N.Y. 10018. Those interested in becoming host families can call (800) 367-0003.

Mother and Son Drown in Creek in Park

A Long Island mother and her young son drowned in a creek in Rockville Centre yesterday after the woman tried to rescue the boy, the Nassau County police said.

The mother, Kausar Shah, took her two sons, ages 4 and 5, and a 5-year-old nephew to Mill River Park from their home in Lynbrook yesterday morning. When the younger son, Midhat Shah, waded into Mill Creek and slipped into deep water, his mother tried to rescue him, said Officer Andrew DeSimone, a police spokesman.

Mrs. Shah, 30, waded into the water and reached her son. She pulled him toward shore, but then she also slipped and they both sank into deeper water, Officer DeSimone said. Neither of the victims was able to swim, he said.

The two other boys ran for help. After the police arrived, it took about an hour to find the bodies of mother and son, which were recovered from the creek.

"It was over their heads," said Officer DeSimone. "Unfortunately, neither could swim."

Mrs. Shah and her son were pronounced dead at Mercy Medical Center in Rockville Centre and taken to the Nassau County medical examiner's office, Officer Desimone said.

3d Teen-Ager Dies After Car Accident

PORT CHESTER, N.Y., May 8 (AP) — A Port Chester High School student has died of injuries suffered in a car crash earlier this week in which two other teen-agers were killed, a spokesman for Westchester County Medical Center said.

The student, Erica Mansfield, 16, died about 11 P.M. on Friday, said the spokesman, Barry Bowman.

Ms. Mansfield had been transported by helicopter to the medical center in Valhalla with major trauma, most notably head trauma, after Tuesday's crash, Mr. Bowman said.

Angela Secco and Michael Thomas, both 17, died in the crash. Ms. Mansfield and three others were injured when the car in which they were riding smashed into a telephone pole and flipped, the police said. All were students at Port Chester High School.

The students were traveling west on Olivia Street about 1 P.M. when the driver, Anthony Ceruzzi, 16, lost control of the car, a 1989 Hyundai, as it approached a curb near South Regent Street, said Sgt. James Cahill.

Rondell Oliver, 16, remained in critical but stable condition today at United Hospital in Port Chester, according to a nursing supervisor. Mr. Ceruzzi and Peter Tallerico, 15, were released earlier in the week.

Kenneth Giddens, a Former Chief Of Voice of America, Dies at 84

By BRUCE LAMBERT

Kenneth R. Giddens, who as head of the Voice of America participated in a stormy debate over whether the agency should be a propaganda organ or a broadcaster of unbiased news, died on Friday at a hospital in Mobile, Ala. He was 84 and lived in Mobile and Washington.

He died of natural causes, his family said.

Thoughout its history, the Voice of America's role in broadcasting overseas has been a source of dispute. Mr. Giddens often found himself torn on the issue as director of the agency from 1969, when President Richard M. Nixon appointed him, until 1977, when President Jimmy Carter dismissed him. He also had the position of assistant director of the United States Information Agency.

His background was as a broadcaster who founded and ran WKRG-AM and FM and WKRG-TV in Mobile.

Associated Press, 1980

Kenneth R. Giddens

Protest Over Influence

Sometimes he criticized what he called State Department interference with Voice of America news reports. Other times he fought to promote the United States on the air and despaired about the tradition of reporting facts unfavorable to the nation's reputation. In 1975, Mr. Giddens accused the State Department of exerting intolerable pressure on newscasts, with officials' saying, "Don't say this, don't say that or don't talk about that."

"It is particularly important for the V.O.A.," he said, "to have an image and reputation of telling the truth."

That year the agency reported on a Senate investigation of moves by the Central Intelligence Agency to assassinate foreign leaders. Mr. Giddens said other nations hid their misdeeds, and "I wish we were smart enough and our system permitted some way legally — legally — so we could clean our dirty linen in private."

At that time, he said, his news employees were "going to play this thing straight."

Later he criticized Federal support of the agency as weak and said it bordered on the disgraceful.

Architect and Theater Owner

Under the Reagan Administration, he returned briefly in 1985 as acting director of Radio Marti, the Government station that broadcasts to Cuba. He remained active in his company as chairman emeritus.

Mr. Giddens was born in Pineapple, Ala., and graduated from Alabama Polytechnic Institute in 1931 with a degree in architecture. In the 1930's and 40's he designed and constructed public works, commercial buildings and apartments and community complexes with movie theaters. He was a co-founder of the Giddens & Rester Theaters, a chain in Alabama, Mississippi and Florida.

In World War II he served as a lieutenant in the Navy Reserve in Washington.

Mr. Giddens founded WKRG operations in 1948, using his initials in the call letters. He was a former board member of the National Association of Broadcasters and president of its Alabama division.

He was also a past chairman of the New Orleans Branch of the Federal Reserve Bank of Atlanta.

Surviving are his wife of 59 years, the former Zelma Kirk; three daughters, Ansley Green and Therese Greer, both of Mobile, and Kay Glenday of Manhattan; four grandchildren, and two great-grandchildren.

Grant E. Curtis, 72, Student-Aid Expert At Tufts University

By BRUCE LAMBERT

Grant E. Curtis, who helped expand scholarship programs to needy students across the nation after working his way through college as a waiter, died on Thursday at his home in Winchester, Mass. He was 72.

The cause was leukemia, said officials at Tufts University, where he was the emeritus dean of financial aid.

Mr. Curtis was a leader in the movement in the 1950's to start considering the financial need of applicants as well as academic promise in awarding scholarships.

He was a co-founder and president of four professional organizations in his field: the Eastern Association of Student Financial Aid Administrators, the National Association of Financial Aid Administrators, the National Institute for Financial Aid Management in Higher Education and the Society for Advancement of Financial Aid Management in Education.

He often testified before Congressional and legislative committees on college finance issues. When Jean Mayer was president of Tufts, he called Mr. Curtis "the senior financial aid officer in the nation."

Mr. Curtis was born in Brockton, Mass. As a Tufts undergraduate, he helped earn his tuition by waiting tables 20 hours a week in two dining halls. A dean noticed his hard work in and out of the classroom and awarded him scholarship aid. As his career developed, he sought to extend the same kind of help to other needy students.

He graduated from Tufts in 1942, then taught radio electronics as a staff sergeant in the Army Air Force during World War II.

After the war he earned a master's degree in education at the University of Chicago. In 1949 he joined Tufts' education department faculty and also worked in the dean's office. Later he was promoted to director of admissions for men and in 1959 was appointed its first director of financial aid. He retired in 1987.

Surviving are his wife of 47 years, the former Elaine C. Chalberg; a daughter, Kristina Curtis of Acton, Mass.; a son, David A. of Paris, and two grandchildren.

George McCorkle, 71, Publisher and Biologist

George M. McCorkle, a retired cryptographer, book publisher and biologist, died on Thursday at Yale-New Haven Hospital in Connecticut. He was 71.

Dr. McCorkle, who lived in Hamden, Conn., died of complications following a stroke, his son, James, said.

A native of Wise, Va., who later moved to Rochester, N.Y., Dr. McCorkle earned a bachelor's degree from Yale University in 1942. Thirty-three years later — after serving as a Navy cryptographer and later as president of a book publishing company — he earned a doctorate in biology from Yale. And from 1979 until 1991, he served as a molecular biologist in the genetics laboratory of Dr. Sidney Altman, a Nobel Prize laureate.

Before his career in biology, Dr. McCorkle was president and chief executive officer of the R. R. Bowker Company, which publishes research and reference books. He began his career with Charles Scribner's Sons in 1946 and later was named a senior vice president and financial officer of New American Library, a paperback book publisher.

When he was 11, Dr. McCorkle earned the distinction of being the youngest member ever admitted to the American Cryptogram Society. During World War II, Dr. McCorkle served in Naval intelligence as a cryptographer, attempting to break Japanese secret codes. He was called back to service in the Korean War.

Besides his son, Dr. McCorkle is survived by his wife, Barbara Backus McCorkle of Hamden; two daughters, Judith Cole of Hamden and Katharine McCorkle of Mars, Pa.; five stepchildren, Frances Clymer of Cody, Wyo., Robert Backus of Burlington, Vt., and Oswald, Anthony and Richard Backus, all of Lawrence, Kan., and two grandchildren.

Weather Report

Meteorology: Pennsylvania State University

Metropolitan Forecast

High pressure along the Middle Atlantic Coast will direct very warm air into the region on gentle breezes from the southwest. Readings will rise above 80 degrees, except along south facing coasts. A cold front in northern New England today will push into the area late tonight. Cooler winds from the northeast will direct ocean-chilled air from the north Atlantic into coastal locations tomorrow. A thundershower may develop inland as the cooler air moves towards the southwest.

Today: Mostly sunny, warmer. High in the 80's, except 70's south shores. Tonight, some clouds, mild. Low in the 60's city, 50's suburbs. Tomorrow, partly sunny, cooler along the coast, perhaps a thundershower inland. High near 80 west, near 70 east.

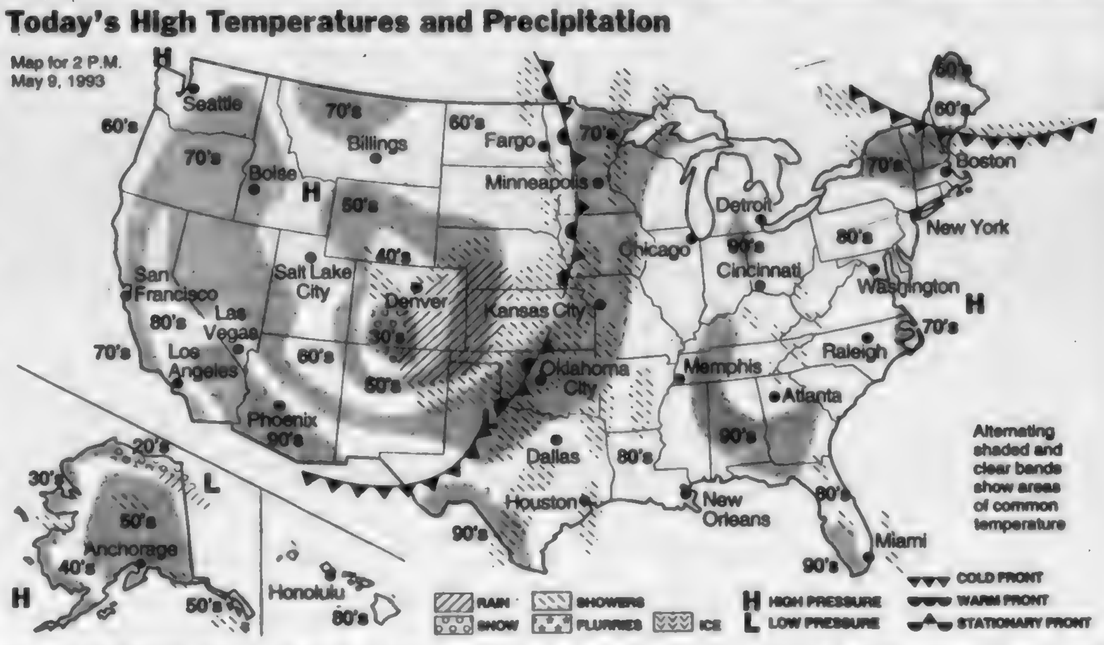
Tuesday, Wednesday: Warm air will return to the region. A cold front will push south across the city on Wednesday, perhaps with a thundershower.

Thursday, Friday: Breezes from the northwest will keep the region a little cooler than normal. Skies will be partly sunny and readings will reach the upper 60's and low 70's.

National Forecast

A disturbance that brought snow and thunderstorms to Salt Lake City yesterday will press southeastward into the southern Plains today. As it lifts unusually humid air over the Plains, showers and thunderstorms will develop. The heaviest thunderstorms will probably occur in the Oklahoma Panhandle and extend into the lower Missouri Valley.

Today's High Temperatures and Precipitation



As the disturbance swings northeastward, the risk of intense storms will shift to the north. Heavy precipitation is likely late today near Omaha.

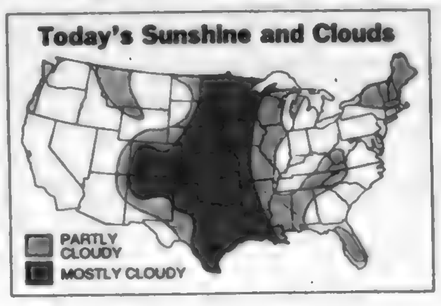
From the Dakotas to the upper Mississippi Valley, scattered showers and thunderstorms are expected to develop as humid winds from the south continue to blow. But in the Great Lakes region, where high pressure will remain nearly stationary, temperatures could reach their highest levels so far this year. Readings are expected to surge well into the 80's in Michigan

Temperatures will reach 90 degrees in the lower Ohio Valley. A humid air mass will bring a few thunderstorms, but there will also be plenty of sunshine. Thundershowers are expected to arrive in the Appalachians as well.

The Northeast will have abundant sunshine. Temperatures will initially reach the lower 80's even near the coast. Sea breezes will bring significant cooling to coastal areas by afternoon. Northern New England will become much cooler. Showers might develop ahead of cooler air that will arrive in the interior Northeast.

Today will be milder in the Pacific Northwest and the interior of the West, but temperatures will still remain below normal in the southern Rockies.

Today's Sunshine and Clouds

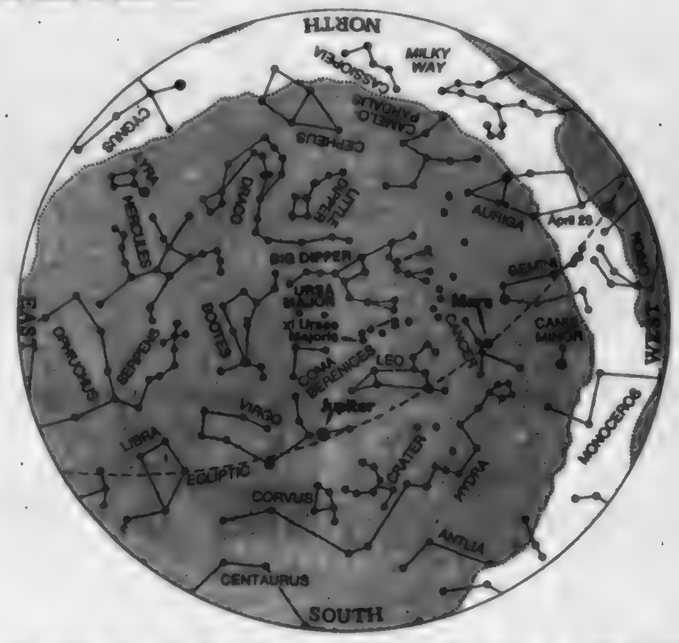


Weather Highlight

The jet stream will shift its position this week, causing the East to become cooler, the South wetter and the Plains drier and warmer.

Sky Watch: Week of May 9

The stars at 9:30 P.M.



Ursa Major, the great bear, is a very large constellation, encompassing more stars spread over several times more sky than the Big Dipper. There are numerous galaxies, nearly a score within the bowl alone. Of the many noteworthy stars three stand out. Xi UMa, in one of the bear's feet, is a visual double star, the first to have an orbit computed, in 1828. Its period is 60 years; it is currently at minimum separation, just under 1 arc-second. It is also the closest visual binary star. W UMa (A) is a pair of stars, each about the Sun's size, orbiting in about eight hours, undergoing two mutual eclipses that vary its magnitude from 7.9 to 8.7. Their centers are about a million miles apart, their sufaces in virtual contact. Proximity and an exchange of gases distort them into ovoid ellipsoids. The variable star Lalande 21185 (B) is fourth in distance from us, a red dwarf, magnitude 7.6, with an unseen companion about 10 times the mass of Jupiter.

To use the map, hold it vertically before you, with the direction you are facing positioned at the bottom. The outer circle represents the horizon; the zenith, the spot directly overhead, is near the center of the map. The map is accurate for 9:30 P.M. Sunday; by Saturday it will be accurate for 9 o'clock.

New Jersey Agreement Allows Courthouse Filming

By The Associated Press

New Jersey courthouses can now double as television and movie sets under an agreement by the New Jersey Motion Picture and Television Development Commission and Chief Justice Robert N. Wilentz of the State Supreme Court.

An agreement reached last week ends the three-year ban on using courthouses for film purposes. Justice Wilentz imposed the ban after he objected to the use of the Essex County courthouse for the filming of "The Bonfire of the Vanities."

Justice Wilentz objected to a scene in the movie depicting blacks chasing a judge and a defendant down a staircase. He said at the time he thought the scene could cause minorities to lose confidence in the judicial system.

No Parties

Under the agreement, filming may take place as long as the material is not produced by a political party or candidate, is not pornographic and is not offensive to minorities.

The commission has appointed a subcommittee to review each project scheduled for courtroom filming.

Subcommittee members, who will serve one-year renewable terms, include: William J. Brennan, former president of the New Jersey State Bar Association; Theodore V. Wells Jr., a lawyer; Douglas S. Eakeley, a former first assistant attorney general; Celeste Holm, commission chairwoman; Michael Proscia, commission vice chairman, and Michael Usian, commission secretary.

The film commission has agreed to grant approval for filming only when recommended by the subcommittee, when court is not in session and when an assignment judge determines that filming will not interfere with daily operations.

Justice Wilentz will review the film policy after a year and has agreed not to revise it or revoke any permission granted by the commission during the year, the commission said.

Since 1982, 10 scenes for movies or television have been filmed at the Essex County Courthouse in Newark, 8 at the Hudson County Courthouse in Jersey City and 1 each at the Bergen County Courthouse in Hackensack and the Passaic County Courthouse in Paterson.

Getaway Car Kills Man After Robbery of a Plant in Brooklyn

By DENNIS HEVESI

A man standing on a street corner was run over and killed on Friday afternoon as two armed men raced their car away from a bottling company in Brooklyn that they had just robbed, the police said.

Two men who police said jumped out of the car after it hit a police car fled on foot and were later captured. But eight hours after the robbery — in what may be a coincidence — another office of the bottling company was also robbed. In all, $50,000 was taken.

A police spokesman, Detective Louis Llanes, said $10,000 was stolen at 2:20 P.M. on Friday from the Brooklyn Bottling Company at 458 Cozine Avenue in East New York. It was not clear if the money had just been delivered, investigators said, but the robbers took it from workers on the street at gunpoint.

The two men then fled in a blue 1989 Pontiac, Detective Llanes said, heading north on Elton Street toward Stanley Avenue. Near that intersection, he said, the getaway car, which was stolen, hit a police car that was responding to the robbery, then careered onto the sidewalk and struck a man on the corner. The pedestrian, Harold Richardson, 59 years old, of the Bronx, died later at Brookdale Hospital Medical Center. The officers were not injured.

With the officers stopping to tend to Mr. Richardson, the suspects ran from their car, dropping the money as they fled. But about two blocks away, at the intersection of Stanley Avenue and Linwood Street, officers from a second police car caught one of the suspects — William Torres, 15, of 165 Meserole Street — after chasing him on foot, Detective Llanes said. A .357-Magnum hand gun was found inside the Pontiac.

Two to three hours later, officers scouring the area arrested the second suspect — Alex Morales, 20, whose address could not be learned — after they spotted him in a nearby train yard. Mr. Morales was taken to Brookdale Hosptial for treatement of cuts he received while climbing a fence.

Both suspects were charged with second-degree murder, robbery, criminal possession of stolen property and criminal possession of a weapon. Mr. Torres was charged as a juvenile offender.

Then, at 11:30 P.M., two men wearing ski masks entered the main office of the Brooklyn Bottling Company, at 1900 Linden Boulevard. "They go to the second-floor office where two employees are present and display handguns," Detective Llanes said. The men demanded the key to the safe and took $40,000 before fleeing. No arrests have been made in the second robbery, Detective Llanes said.

Teachers' Union Leader Backs Terms for a Pact

sense that she has set her sights now on the kind of settlement every other union has gotten," Mr. Jones said.

Ms. Feldman accused Mayor Dinkins of stalling in the teacher talks, saying that "no serious negotiations have taken place" since the fact-finding panel released its report two weeks ago.

Mr. Hanley, however, said that the two sides had met twice and conferred frequently by phone during the period. He said the city's negotiating team is available to meet at any time with teachers' union negotiators.

To back their claims for the additional state money, teachers' union officials quote the state board's recommendation that teachers receive 8.5 percent increases "plus an appropriate payment of additional money as may be made available to the Board of Education from the State of New York."

Since the state made an additional $145 million available to the Board of Education for city schools this year, union officials say they want part of that money.

But Mr. Hanley, quoting an earlier passage of the report, said the panel recommended that teachers receive "supplemental educational funding provided by the state in its Excellence in Teaching Program," which was a special appropriation to augment teachers' salaries that the Legislature approved for several years after 1986. This year, however, the Legislature did not appropriate money under the program, and as a result, Mr. Hanley said, no state funds are available.

"There has been state money in the past, but it's not there now," Mr. Hanley said.

Three members of the central Board of Education, Michael Petrides, Carol Gresser and Luis Reyes, attended the union's meeting and were asked by teachers to outline their views on the dispute over the state financing.

Mr. Petrides declined to comment. Ms. Gresser called the issue "the raw nerve" of the negotiations, but she refused to elaborate. Mr. Reyes, however, said that the school system has many pressing claims on the additional $145 million, noting that 22,000 additional students are entering the system each year. That drew a sharp reaction from Ms. Feldman.

"What it's going to come down to for those 22,000 kids is whether they're going to have teachers or baby-sitters," Ms. Feldman said.

Reaching an agreement with the teachers' union is important to the Dinkins administration. During the Mayor's 1989 campaign, Ms. Feldman and the union provided critical support, and the Mayor is eager to resolve the contract dispute in hopes of renewing that support.

On the other hand, in October of 1990 Mr. Dinkins was criticized as ceding too much to the teachers' union, and the administration does not want to appear to have negotiated too timidly before a campaign in which the city's fiscal woes will be a major issue.

Gov. Mario M. Cuomo, who also addressed the teachers' meeting, also called for quick action on the various reform proposals before the Legislature. "We do not have the most efficient school system," Mr. Cuomo said.

"Coach's Daughter" Lisa (Allyce Beasley) is engaged to an inconsiderate bore. It's the best she can do, she claims. But Coach (Nicholas Colasanto) is a father who sees only beauty in a daughter. He inspires Lisa to send the lout packing. (1982)

"Peterson Crusoe" When the spot on his X-ray is negative, Norm (George Wendt) wants to celebrate by starting over in Bora Bora. But just as the Cheers regulars are comparing him to Gauguin, he is found hiding in the bar's back office. (1984)

"Fear Is My Co-Pilot" The plane is falling and the pilot looks dead. "You and me married?" Sam (Ted Danson) says to Diane (Shelley Long). "Why didn't I ask you when I had the chance?" She says, "At least we're going together." The pilot recovers. (1986)

"The Proposal" Because Diane wants a romantic proposal (and not on the telephone), Sam arranges a moonlight sail. "What I'm trying to say is, will you marry me?" he asks. Diane pauses and answers, "No." Sam throws her overboard. (1986)

"Thanksgiving Orphans" Norm's turkey is taking a little too long to cook, Sam's date has canceled at the last minute, and Diane is dressed like a Pilgrim. With everyone getting a little testy, the peas, carrots, yams and cranberry sauce begin to fly. (1986)

"The Gift of the Woodi" Woody (Woody Harrelson) writes a birthday song for Kelly (Jackie Swanson) because he can't afford a present. "Kelly, Kelly, Kelly, Kelly," goes the chorus. "Woody, that was beautiful," Kelly says. "So, where's my gift?" (1989)

"For Real Men Only" Frasier (Kelsey Grammer) is pleased that the Jewish faith of his wife, Lilith (Bebe Neuwirth), will be passed on to their son. But when the rabbi begins the circumcision, he hides the baby under his coat and heads for Cheers. (1989)

"Honor Thy Mother" Mama Lozupone (Sada Thompson) asks her daughter Carla (Rhea Perlman) to carry on a tradition and christen one of her children with her father's first name and her mother's maiden name. The result? Benito Mussolini. (1990)

"Days of Wine and Neuroses" Sam finds Rebecca (Kirstie Allie) drunk and proclaiming that she doesn't love her fiancé, Robin Colcord (Roger Rees), and wants Sam instead. Belting out a few bars of "We've Got Tonight," she passes out. (1990)

The Man Who Reinvented the Who's 'Tommy'

By JANET MASLIN

BACKSTAGE AT THE ST. JAMES THEATER, the director Des McAnuff was summoned to the phone just after the audience had finally stopped cheering for "Tommy" and gone home. "That was sort of the love call," he explained a few moments later, referring to his conversation with Pete Townshend, on whose celebrated rock opera the show is based. Twenty-four hours earlier, Mr. Townshend had been at the St. James on a triumphant opening night, after which "Tommy" set a day-after-opening record of nearly $500,000 for ticket sales. Now, back in London, he was maintaining enough of a spiritual presence in New York to time his good wishes precisely to the final curtain.

No wonder. When he wrote "the crowd went crazy as Tommy hit the stage" 24 years ago (in the lyrics to "Sally Simpson"), Mr. Townshend nicely anticipated the effect his work would one day have on Broadway audiences. But it took Mr. McAnuff, the artistic director of the La Jolla Playhouse in California and the Tony-winning director of "Big River," to collaborate with the Who's mastermind in finding the theatrical heart of "Tommy." Together, they have dusted off this rock-and-roll chestnut and coaxed forth a daring Broadway musical.

The changes overseen by Mr. McAnuff are so far-reaching that it feels as if "Tommy" has been reinvented, though this is still the basic tale of a boy turned by childhood trauma into a "deaf, dumb and blind kid," only to emerge from his silence as a charismatic, pinball-playing star. Musical solos have been broadened into duets or choral numbers; a new interplay between adult and boyish Tommys strengthens the central character; the storytelling has become swift and linear; the minimal props whirl across the stage in exuberant motion.

With a fluid visual backdrop for its story, this sophisticated $6 million production employs 54 projectors for 18 panels at the rear of the stage, images projected onto a gauzy front curtain, television monitors, smoke, mirrors, major mechanical devices beneath the stage floor, and pinball machines that go up in flames or blaze with light — all without losing its streamlined nature. Or precision: Mr. McAnuff had to be persuaded to allow a

Ask the Magpie About 'Blood Brothers'

The British musical has too many omens for its own good.

Lynn Redgrave's beguiling memoir is a gift for her father and the audience.

Con O'Neill and Stephanie Lawrence in "Blood Brothers"— To the extent that we are pulled into the musical, Ms. Lawrence and Mr. O'Neill do most of the pulling.

Phil Cutta/"Blood Brothers"

WILLY RUSSELL'S "BLOOD Brothers" is a musical about the deleterious effects of the British class system on a pair of twins separated at birth. From the very beginning you know it's going to end badly. The prologue tells you so. But even if it didn't, you would get the idea in short order.

There are omens everywhere. Mr. Russell rarely lets a moment go by without foreshadowing his foregone conclusion. The portents in "Macbeth" pale by comparison.

What are a few riddling witches when you're dealing with a narrator (Warwick Evans) who looks like a small-town mortician and spouts doggerel about the devil nipping at your heels; veils of smoke that settle periodically over the stage of the Music Box Theater like atomic fallout; lyrics that make repeated reference to Marilyn Monroe (and we know how she wound up) — not to mention the kind of eerie movie underscoring that suggests a black widow spider in the bed sheets.

Even the bus conductor in "Blood Brothers" provides a warning. Confronted with a rebellious young man who doesn't want to cough up the full fare, he bellows righteously, "No one gets off without the price being paid." He's not just talking about public transportation, of course. He's talking about the planet and this bus ride called life.

Mr. Russell, the Liverpool hairdresser turned writer, has always been on the side of working-class stiffs struggling to rise above the drudgery of their lot. In plays like "Educating Rita" and "Shirley Valentine" he envisioned the possibility of betterment or, at least, escape. "Blood Brothers," a far more pessimistic work, views England as a dead end for all but the privileged few. Most of the time, the musical is encased in brick. The designer Andy Walmsley has thrown a two-story wall across the back of the stage, while sorry row houses line the sides. Graffiti provide the color.

But even when Mrs. Johnstone (Stephanie Lawrence) and her brood move from Liverpool to public housing in the country, the setting isn't that cheerful. The green pastures and blue skies look like drawings in a cheap picture book. Mrs. Johnstone is a weary but good-hearted cleaning lady who has so many children and so little money she doesn't know what to do. Pursued by creditors, abandoned by her husband and about to have twins, she bows to the inevitable. When the twins are born, she surrenders one of them to her employer — well-heeled but sterile Mrs. Lyons (Barbara Walsh). It's all hush-hush. No one is to know that Eddie (the adopted twin) and Mickey (the twin who stays behind) are related. Even when they later meet, discover they have the same birthday and swear to be blood brothers, only their mothers know the true story.

Strained as the premise is, it allows Mr. Russell to illustrate his conviction that there's nothing like the right class to give you a leg up in the world. With the advantages of wealthy parents going for him, Eddie (Mark Michael Hutchinson) rises to the top, like Jersey cream. Unable to get a decent education, a long-term job or an even break, Mickey (Con O'Neill) marries his pregnant girlfriend, spirals downward and lands in prison, where drug therapy transforms him into a zombie. By the time the character touches rock bottom, Mr. O'Neill has endowed him with such pain and hopelessness that you can't help feeling for him. The actor does something unusual with the hopelessness, you'll notice. Instead of playing it passively, as a sort of numbness, a giving up, he turns it into a hyped-up thrashing about, a state bordering on terror.

The final 10 minutes of "Blood Brothers" pack a punch far greater than the preceding 150 minutes might lead you to expect. Up to then, your patience may be tested by the obviousness of Mr. Russell's tale. He seems to want to duplicate the style and simplicity of a children's fable, which also lays out the journey in advance and reminds you by the periodic cawing of the crow or the gleeful snigger of the troll under the bridge of the dangers lurking ahead. Actually, until the twins finally come of age, many of the cast members — adults, all — are asked to play neighborhood children and children's games. The conceit is more off-putting than revelatory, and definitely not cute. But there is yet another hitch.

Storybook simplicity may not be what's required here. For years, society has been automatically held accountable for the individual's woes — so much so that the observation has become a cliché. If you're going to make the argument, it has to be developed with far more complexity, more one-of-a-kind details, than "Blood Brothers" is willing to supply.

I'll say this in Mr. Russell's defense. His musical was initially staged in London in 1983 (where it continues to run), and the passage of 10 years has surely robbed it of some of its bite. Then, too, the British class system, crippling as it is to those who must endure it, has always seemed far more quaint than destructive from an American perspective. Liverpool, as depicted in the show's twinkling backdrop, even exerts a certain fairy-tale enchantment, although I grant that that may be irony at work.

To the extent that we are pulled into Mr. Russell's musical, two performances do most of the pulling. Ms. Lawrence has considerable heart and the sweet gallantry of the downtrodden who refuse to give up or give in to self-pity. She's Shirley Valentine's unlucky sister. Assigned the strongest numbers in Mr. Russell's soft-rock score, she delivers

A Trinidad Playwright Awash in Words

By WILLIAM HARRIS

William Harris, a consulting editor to Dance Ink, often writes about dance and theater.

Mustapha Matura's 'Playboy of the West Indies' at Lincoln Center is a bow to Synge, the comedy of life and the indelible voice of the people.

JOHN MILLINGTON SYNGE'S "Playboy of the Western World" is one of the sacred cows of modern drama, a classic comedy from 1907 much revered and frequently revived. But that didn't stop the Caribbean dramatist Mustapha Matura from tinkering with the original. In his "Playboy of the West Indies," which opens tonight at the Mitzi E. Newhouse Theater at Lincoln Center, Mr. Matura has transposed the action from Ireland to Trinidad. In doing so, he has underscored parallels between two seemingly disparate cultures — a shared love of language, drinking, humor and superstition — and reaffirmed the universality of Synge's parable about hypocrisy. At the same time, the play, similar to his other work, is personal — part memoir and part political satire.

Like Synge, Mr. Matura wallows in words. His text, written in a Caribbean patois, is dense, melodic and quirky — just the way he speaks. But he hasn't touched the parricidal plot. Ken, a naïve, awkward fellow, flees to a small village, believing he has killed his father. Instead of his being ostracized, the locals celebrate — and through constant retelling, exaggerate — his achievement; the women compete for his affections. Yet when it is revealed that his father has not died, the villagers feel betrayed and turn on him.

In Mr. Matura's version, which he completed in about four weeks, the coastal town Mayo has become Mayaro, the pub is now a rum shop, and the romantic leads, Pegeen and Christy, are Peggy and Ken. Directed by Gerald Gutierrez (responsible for last season's acclaimed revival of Frank Loesser's "Most Happy Fella" on Broadway), the cast numbers 14 and includes Lorraine Toussaint as Peggy and Victor Love as Ken.

"In Trinidad, language is a way people entertain themselves," said Mr. Matura over a drink near Lincoln Center after a recent rehearsal. A native Trinidadian, he has lived in London since 1961. "After all, there isn't much else to do. The better you are with words, the more status you acquire. I'm not talking about educated people, but ordinary people who, through using their imagination, develop gifts for language. Humor and wit are prized qualities among Trinidadians.

"I wrote this play and my others," he continued, "because I'm constantly trying to understand the character of Trinidad and the Trinidadians. They are enormously resilient: they will be down, but they will always tell you a joke or offer a drink. That mirrors the Irish. What also makes Trinidadians so fascinating, unpredictable and unique among the people of the Caribbean is that Trinidad is populated by so many cultures that overlap: African, Indian, Chinese, Spanish, French, British, Portuguese and even Lebanese."

At 54, Mr. Matura is probably the best-known Trinidadian writer after the novelist V. S. Naipaul. To date, he has written more than 20 plays, as well as a British television sitcom about five black siblings. In 1991, with "The Coup," a satire about an aborted putsch in Trinidad, he became the first West Indian dramatist to have a play staged at the Royal National Theater. He has been commissioned to write a new work for the Royal Shakespeare Company.

Yet few Matura plays have been mounted in New York. According to Mr. Gutierrez,

'HAIR'

Putting A Crimp Therein

To the Editor:

David Richards's article on the 25th anniversary of "Hair" ["Lighting a Candle for 'Hair' at 25," April 25] omitted one important aspect of the musical's history: the censorship struggles that plagued "Hair" despite its popularity. In Boston, Atlanta, Chattanooga, Tenn., and elsewhere, government officials, relying on obscenity or "public nudity" laws, banned the musical from local stages.

The Chattanooga ban led to a major Supreme Court decision, Southeastern Promotions Ltd. v. Conrad, in which the court recognized the First Amendment value of live theater and set strict limits on the power of local governments to prevent theatrical performances.

Unfortunately, the decision didn't put an end to censorship of live theater or attacks on performers and directors who use nudity. In the last several years, performance artists who deal with difficult issues like sexual violence and homophobia have been the most frequent targets of attack and have been accused of purveying "pornography" when this is far from their purpose or effect.

The censorship issue has also extended to traditional theater. In 1990, police in Charlotte, N. C., prohibited one location from presenting a nude scene in a production of Terrence McNally's "Frankie and Johnny in the Clair de Lune"; the next year, Chattanooga decided to ban "Oh! Calcutta!" This year, hoping to capitalize on the Supreme Court's restrictive 1991 nude-dancing decision, some states are considering legislation that would specifically prohibit nudity in erotic dancing or genuine theatrical productions.

Censorship of nudity or sexual content in the arts remains a prime feature of our society's continuing "culture wars." And despite America's history of bold experiments and innovative shows like "Hair" and "Oh! Calcutta!" artists all over the country are facing pressures to avoid anything that conservative pressure groups might consider controversial.

A 'Cast Member' Remembers

To the Editor:

I first saw "Hair" in the winter of 1969 at the Biltmore Theater. The show opened with the loin-clothed Gerome Ragni swinging via rope from the heights of the opposite box seat. He bounded onstage, jumped into the audience and perched on the back of the third-row seat in front of me — his bare feet on the arms of my chair. Oh, wow! Too much! Oh, wow! He looked down, asked me questions, then asked for a handout. I dug in my purse and came up with a quarter, which he slung backward over his shoulder deep into the stage.

How could I remember what happened in the next few minutes before he jumped back onstage? I do remember, however, and will never forget that, for a minuscule moment, I was in the original Broadway production of "Hair."

HOLOCAUST MUSEUM

History Repeating Itself?

To the Editor:

In his article on the Holocaust Museum, "Shaping a Monument to Memory" [April 11], Herbert Muschamp refers to "floating glass bridges engraved with the names of devastated cities." More specifically, they are the names of the destroyed Jewish communities, country by country. Ironically, the segment shown in one of the photographs accompanying the article is of towns and cities in Yugoslavia, many of which are suffering today through the tragedy of "ethnic cleansing."

'ANGELS IN AMERICA'

Out of the Closet, Into the Limelight

To the Editor:

As a homosexual performer, writer and producer, I am at once encouraged and dismayed by the sudden proliferation of mainstream plays and films with homosexual themes, such as the Pulitzer Prize-winning stage epic "Angels in America" ["Finding a Devil Within to Portray Roy Cohn," April 18] and the big-budget film "Philadelphia." I am heartened that such artistic endeavors are taking place but distressed that they are seemingly being done without gay actors in their leading roles.

Several years back, the Asian community became outraged when a Caucasian was cast in a major role as a Eurasian in "Miss Saigon." Gay and lesbian actors should now be rallying against what would appear to be a trend.

For much too long too many of my fellow gay actors have been rejected for straight roles because they were "not masculine enough" or because of their "particular speech patterns" or even because they were "feminine in appearance." Suddenly, there are roles that these actors should be playing, and they find themselves not even in the race.

The other morning, in a television interview, Kelly Lynch talked about playing the role of a woman who has an affair with another woman in the film "Three of Hearts." Ms. Lynch turned to the camera and announced that she, "of course, was not homosexual." At this point we do not need straight actors apologizing for or explaining why they are playing homosexual roles.

Ron Leibman, a straight actor, is portraying Roy Cohn in "Angels in America." Tom Hanks, another straight actor, is playing a gay man dying of AIDS in the forthcoming "Philadelphia." Since this film's cast is laden with "bankable" names like Denzel Washington and Jason Robards, there was no reason not to hire a gay actor for this pivotal role.

It is imperative that the public become accustomed to seeing gay actors portraying gay characters.

WICKER

Many More Miles to Go

To the Editor:

When my family visits the Renwick Gallery of the Smithsonian for the "Just American Wicker" exhibition ["American Wicker Puts On a Show of Shapeliness," April 25], we'll be hoping to see examples of "traveling wicker," chairs that rode the rails in many parlor cars during the early part of the century.

Our two wicker chairs were among a half-dozen that my grandfather, an engineer on the Long Island Rail Road's New York City-to-Montauk run, got at the employees' price of 50 cents each when the line changed its parlor car service, around 1930.

Made by the Prairie Grass Furniture Company of Glendale, Long Island, these sturdy, unadorned armchairs spent decades in a dusty cellar, going nowhere. Recently, with a new paint job, they made a short car trip to places of honor in our living room, about a mile and a half from Penn Station. If only these family heirlooms had odometers.

THE WHO'S TOMMY A NEW MUSICAL

"Broadway will never be the same again. This is the musical breakthrough, a high-tech, show-biz marvel — as taut and time-breaking as the day after tomorrow. Although the performance is fundamentally a wonderful ensemble, note must be taken of Marcia Mitzman as the Mother, Paul Kandel as the wicked and bibulous Uncle Ernie, and most of all, of Michael Cerveris' resonantly dazed and radiant Tommy. Brilliant, bloody brilliant."
—Clive Barnes, New York Post

"TOMMY is a symphony of sound, images and ideas conducted with breathtaking genius. Bravo to all the performers: The extremely appealing Michael Cerveris, as Tommy, emanates vulnerability and strength at the same time; his mother and father are Marcia Mitzman and Jonathan Dokuchitz, with voices of gold and the acting talent to match; Paul Kandel, doing a riveting star turn as the wicked Uncle Ernie; and Cheryl Freeman, screaming sleazy sex appeal as a Tina Turner-like Acid Queen."
—Roma Torre, NY 1 News

"TOMMY is at long last the authentic rock musical that has eluded Broadway for two generations — an entertainment juggernaut that lifts the audience right out of its seats. TOMMY is the first musical in years to feel completely alive in its own moment. No wonder that for two hours it makes the world seem young."
—Frank Rich, The New York Times

MUSIC AND LYRICS BY PETE TOWNSHEND • BOOK BY PETE TOWNSHEND & DES McANUFF

"Dominating the stage instead of being usurped by hardware, the performers shine."—Frank Rich, The New York Times

"TOMMY is a thrilling transcendent experience — riveting and fascinating and all-conquering. It is awesome! Congratulations to a splendid ensemble, the hardest-working cast in show business." —Dennis Cunningham, WCBS-TV

"TOMMY is a high-energy spectacle. To note that the scenery is phenomenal is a bit like pointing out that the Grand Canyon is deep. Give yourself over to the cascading sights and sounds." —David Richards, The New York Times

Battle of the Action Heroes

Here they come: men with big guns, rippling torsos, a way with bad dialogue. Arnold, Sly, Clint — they're on a first-name basis with our basest instincts. This summer, watch them duke it out at the box office with a Bruce Lee biopic! A silly action-hero spoof! A Steven Spielberg extravaganza about dinosaurs! Not since Godzilla met Megalon has the big screen seen such a clash of the titans. Let the games begin. RICK MARIN

What's Hot In Summer Movies?

THE BUSIEST PEOPLE IN HOLLYWOOD RIGHT now are probably the shrinks. Even from a distance, you can feel the industry's mass hysteria rising as the studios gear up for a summer of bruising competition among 60 or so films. There is such a glut that the traditional opening date for the season's first films, Memorial Day, has been jumped by nearly a month. Summer started for Hollywood two days ago, with the release of a big comedy, "Dave," a big action film, "Dragon: The Bruce Lee Story," and a piece of upscale counterprogramming, 'Much Ado About Nothing."

While executives are hyperventiliating about whether "Jurassic Park" will give Universal Studios a desperately needed hit, whether "Cliffhanger" can save Sylvester Stallone's career, whether "The Last Action Hero" will be ready for its June 18 release, the rest of us can say, "Relax. It's just a movie."

The question for the average moviegoer is how to sort through the hype. Basically, you need to see two movies to keep up your end of the conversation at barbecues: "Jurassic Park" and "The Last Action Hero." (If you are the kind of filmgoer who watches only PBS at home, you still need to see two movies, but they are "Much Ado About Nothing," Kenneth Branagh's latest Shakespeare adaptation, and "Orlando," Sally Potter's version of Virginia Woolf's novel.)

Angela Bassett belting out a song as Tina Turner in "What's Love Got to Do With It?"—Bound to take off.

If you're game after that, here is a guide to the top-10 must-see movies of summer, in order of importance. Most have not yet been screened for critics. What follows is an educated guess based on advance word (test-audience responses have an uncanny way of leaking out) and on the principle that when hype really works, you end up watching some rotten films just to see what the fuss is about (the "Basic Instinct" principle). These may not be the best summer movies, but they're likely to be the biggest.

"Jurassic Park" (Opening June 11)
There's no avoiding Steven Spielberg's giant special-effects adventure about theme-park dinosaurs run amok — partly because it cost at least $60 million (some guess closer to $80 million), so no one is going to skimp on marketing. On the plus side, this is the kind of movie Mr. Spielberg does best. It promises to be less fussy than "Hook" and less violent than the Michael Crichton novel on which it is based.

"The Last Action Hero" (June 18)
He said he'd be back. Another megabucks movie starring the man who has never had a flop. Arnold Schwarzenegger tweaks his own image in a comedy-adventure about a boy who walks onto a movie screen and meets his hero. Directed by John McTiernan ("Die Hard"), this could be the ultimate combination of comic-Arnold and action-Arnold.

"In the Line of Fire" (July 9)
Here is Clint Eastwood (acting, not directing) in what sounds like last year's Kevin Costner movie. He's a guilt-ridden Secret Service agent who failed to save President Kennedy and is now playing cat-and-mouse with another potential assassin. Mr. Eastwood won't win any Oscars for this one, but he can ride his popularity all the way to the bank.

"Sleepless in Seattle" (June 25)
Preview audiences reportedly loved this romantic comedy, in which Tom Hanks and Meg Ryan are made for each other, though they live a continent apart. A warning sign: They meet cutesy-cute when his son calls a radio talk show. A good sign: The trailer has more comedy than treacle. The film was directed by Nora Ephron, who wrote "When Harry Met Sally . . ."; before the summer ends, you will get very tired of hearing those two movies compared.

"What's Love Got to Do With It?" (June 25)
The Tina Turner story, with Angela Bassett (Betty Shabazz in "Malcolm X") as Tina, rocking and rolling with the punches she gets from Ike (Laurence Fishburne). The real Tina rerecorded her old hits and four new songs for the soundtrack. This film is bound to take off, following the "Bodyguard" principle that a movie with a hit soundtrack is unstoppable.

"Dave" (Now playing at a theater near you)
Kevin Kline is a very smart actor; Ivan Reitman ("Ghostbusters") is not a subtle director. Somehow this combination makes for a wonderfully funny and goofy satire about a guy who looks so much like the President he takes over his job.

"The Firm" (July 2)
There isn't much of a buzz about "The Firm"; maybe things are too quiet. But you can't count out Tom Cruise, directed by Sydney Pollack, in an adaptation of John Grisham's best-selling legal thriller.

"Rising Sun" (July 30)
Sean Connery, as a retired Los Angeles detective who knows the mysterious ways of the Japanese, instructs his partner, Wesley Snipes, while they go through a murder investigation. There has been some mucking around with Michael Crichton's novel, probably for better and for worse. The interracial casting adds another layer of tension, but the director and co-writer, Philip Kaufman, has changed the identity of the murderer in a move that has political correctness written all over it.

"Free Willy" (July 16)
The tender story of a boy and his pet whale. Willy is a captive orca, and Jesse the neglected 12-year-old who tries to free him. In a season filled with family-film hopefuls, this is the one being talked about as a sleeper.

"Cliffhanger" (May 28)
Sylvester Stallone climbs a mountain in one of the season's most expensive movies (around $70 million). There are great action sequences from the director Renny Harlin ("Die Hard 2"), but the trailer makes you wonder about the rest of the movie. Against majestic choral music, John Lithgow looks mad, Janine Turner from "Northern Exposure" looks sad, Mr. Stallone looks confused, and no dialogue is heard. What can they be saying? ("Yo, mountain!")

One final warning. As the wise Sean Connery says in "Rising Sun," "When something looks too good to be true, then it's not true." □

Hong Kong's Flashy Films Battle for American Fans

By JEFFREY RESSNER

LOS ANGELES

IMAGES FLASH BY LIKE lightning in "Savior of the Soul," a low-budget 1991 fantasy film in which a young vigilante fights off a supernatural punk named Silver Fox. Flying daggers zigzag across the screen. The hero stuns Silver Fox with a yo-yo that changes into a sword. Both men defy gravity and joust in midair. The film is filled with enough slick special effects and editing tricks to make even George Lucas envious.

Welcome to the new wave of Hong Kong cinema — films characterized by comic-book images, hyperkinetic quick cuts and mind-boggling story lines. The 1987 film "A Chinese Ghost Story," for example, featured a rapping samurai, a descent through hell and a demon with a mile-long tongue. "Hard-Boiled" (1992) had enough gunplay to make "Lethal Weapon" look like "The Little Mermaid." There are dazzling martial-arts comedies, mystical sex sagas, even heartwarming coming-of-age dramas.

Aside from being made in Hong Kong, what unites these films is their style — a visceral excitement, a sense that the action might jump off the screen. Unlike American films, Hong Kong movies are produced in assembly-line fashion; a handful of studios churn out scores of potboilers, with stars sometimes running from one set to another in the same day. The films, often made in Cantonese or Mandarin, are dubbed for showings throughout Asia or subtitled for English-speaking audiences.

Along with the United States, India and Japan, Hong Kong is one of the world's leading producers of movies. Although a serious dramatic film is occasionally made there, most Hong Kong movies are action-oriented.

These high-octane, offbeat pictures tend to be shown in the United States at festivals or Chinatown theaters. But while appreciated heretofore by a small underground, they are beginning to reach a wider American audience amid both optimism and skepticism about their ability to shuck off their cult status. One manifestation of the phenomenon is "1993 Festival Hong Kong: Cinema of Blazing Passions," a two-week, 14-film series devoted to the Hong Kong style, opening on Thursday at the Cinema Village (formerly Cinema 12) in New York.

Earlier this year, an alliance to import the flamboyant movies was forged between the formidable Hong Kong studio Golden Harvest and AMC, the second largest theater chain in the United States. AMC, which operates 1,600 screens in 245 cities, recently sponsored a two-week series of subtitled films at theaters in Southern California and has plans to run similar programs at other multiplexes. Golden Harvest has found that such retrospectives held in non-Chinatown theaters are attracting growing numbers of college students and other movie fans.

"I don't think these pictures will work in Pocatello, Idaho," says Noel Kendall, an AMC vice president. "But in cities like Miami, Philadelphia, Detroit, Atlanta and San Francisco, we think there's commercial potential."

Indeed, in 1989 the Chicago Art Institute's Film Center drew one of its biggest audiences ever when it showed the action-packed "Police Story," starring the kung fu comedy star and director Jackie Chan, during a two-month Hong Kong series. And last December, the first night of a two-week "Festival Hong Kong" program at the Nuart Theater in West Los Angeles broke the theater's festival records, with box-office receipts matching those for hit independent films like "Wings of Desire" and "Drugstore Cowboy."

"The box-office grosses were tremendous," according to Gary Meyer, a booking executive at Landmark Theater Corporation, which operates the Nuart. "We estimated that 80 percent of the audience was non-Chinese. It looks like we may be on the brink of a broader audience acceptance of these films."

"AUDIENCES ALWAYS WANT to see something new," says the director John Woo as he eats steamed chicken's feet in an elegant Mandarin restaurant near the Universal Pictures studio in Los Angeles. Heralded as the Asian counterpart to Sergio Leone or Sam Peckinpah, Mr. Woo makes heavily stylized action films of soulful gangster angst and slow-motion carnage, including "A Better Tomorrow" (1986) and "The Killer" (1989), hailed as prime examples of the Hong Kong school.

"American movies have too many traditional formulas and plots," he says, stabbing the air with a chicken's foot for emphasis. "Hong Kong movies have a wild look of freedom about them." Last year, Mr. Woo moved to Los Angeles from Hong Kong and signed a multipicture deal with Universal that begins this fall with "Hard Target," a gun-happy thriller starring Jean-Claude Van Damme.

Says Oliver Stone, the director of "Platoon" and "J.F.K.": "These movies have always been a secret sort of thing. I love the action, the humor, the fight choreography. They're fun movies to see with a date." Mr. Stone saw his first Asian films, mostly sword-and-sorcery epics, in the Orient during the mid-1960's and would later venture frequently to Chinatown theaters in New York. He has kept up with more recent titles on laserdisks.

Mr. Stone isn't the only film maker impressed by the vigor of current Hong Kong films. Francis Ford Coppola, Martin Scorsese and Walter Hill are reportedly avid fans, along with younger talents like Sam Raimi and Quentin Tarantino. In some cases, their enthusiasm has evolved into business relationships. Mr. Raimi, the director of campy horror films like "Darkman" and "Army of Darkness," is an executive producer of "Hard Target," while Mr. Tarantino, the writer-director behind last year's gritty "Reservoir Dogs," is writing an action script tailored for Mr. Woo.

Aside from their intended Asian audiences and highbrow film festival devotees, Hong Kong movies also attract the same cult-movie crowd that haunts comic-book conventions and subscribes to specialized publications like Psychotronic Video.

"The underground is really where it started," says Tom Weisser, coeditor of the pocket-size fan magazine Asian Trash Cinema and owner of a small mail-order video service in Miami. "It's obvious that Hong Kong movies are getting more popular. Even Blockbuster Video is stocking copies of 'The Killer' now."

For years, these high-octane movies have had their devotees. Now they aspire to more than cult status.

But not everyone is convinced that Hong Kong cinema is the Next Big Thing. "Hong Kong movies may do well on the two coasts of America," says the Asian box-office king Jackie Chan, "but it'll be hard to penetrate the average home, especially in the Midwest. They're just not exposed to the culture of Southeast Asia. I've met many Americans who ask me if Hong Kong is the capital of Japan."

Mr. Chan tried to break into the domestic market in the 1980's in forgettable Hollywood productions like "The Cannonball Run" and "The Big Brawl." Since then, he has worked exclusively in Hong Kong, where his stunt-filled adventure films ("Wheels on Meals," "Project A," "Armor of God") draw from influences ranging from Buster Keaton to Indiana Jones. Despite Mr. Chan's enormous popularity in other parts of the world, he remains pessimistic about his chances for success in this country.

He isn't the sole skeptic. "The American action crowd has traditionally never gone for dubbed movies," says Tom Pollock, the chairman of Universal, "and they don't like to read subtitles while they watch their slaughter."

Nevertheless, he believes that the AMC-Golden Harvest experiment might work on a limited scale: "There's a chance they can make some money. Probably not huge amounts, but they can build an audience and make money later on."

By the time that acceptance comes, if indeed it does, the underground fans who initiated the phenomenon may have moved on to more exotic offerings. "A lot of people who used to be really into Chinese movies are starting to look into other types of films now," says Mr. Weisser of Asian Trash Cinema, "weird stuff from places like Turkey and Argentina."

He pauses for a moment before asking earnestly, "Are you interested in a mind-blowing version of 'Batman' made in the Philippines?" ■

Out of the East

"1993 Festival Hong Kong: Cinema of Blazing Passions," which will offer 14 new and recent films, opens on Thursday at the Cinema Village (formerly Cinema 12), 22 East 12th Street, and runs through May 27. Screening times may be obtained by calling (212) 924-3363.

Here is the schedule.

A Playwright Awash in Words

"Americans don't take time to explore Caribbean culture. No one even thinks the Caribbean has a culture. Derek Walcott's plays aren't performed either. There is a resistance to these plays as opposed to African-American plays."

In 1976, the Urban Arts Corps, an Off Off Broadway troupe, presented Mr. Matura's "Play Mas," which Richard Eder described in The Times as an "acid but lovely stage piece" about political reality and illusion. Reviewing "Rum n' Coca-Cola" the next year, about an aging calypso singer, Mr. Eder said, "It does not work nearly as well but its first half-hour or so is brilliant." The Phoenix Theater presented the world premiere of "Meetings" in 1981, a satire about Trinidadians' embrace of consumerism, which was well received.

"Playboy of the West Indies" is not a new play — it opened in Oxford, England, in 1984 — but it has proved to be Mr. Matura's most popular. In the United States alone, it has already been performed at the Court Theater in Chicago, the Crossroads Theater in New Brunswick, N.J., the Arena Stage in Washington and the Yale Repertory Theater in New Haven.

"It never occurred to me to do one of his more recent works," says André Bishop, the artistic director of Lincoln Center Theater. "It is a charming and powerful adaptation of a favorite play of mine. What's interesting is this notion of building someone up, of creating an image of a hero, only to have that image shattered. The hero is destroyed almost within seconds of his heroics. There are lots of examples of this in our lives today, certainly in politics and culture. When the image we have of someone is proved not to be the right one, we go for the jugular."

"Playboy of the West Indies" is not as overtly political as some of Mr. Matura's other scripts. "I don't want to spend the rest of my life telling white people they're racists," he said. "They must know it by now," the playwright added with a grin. Yet it is peopled by familiar Matura Trinidadians: an assortment of scoundrels, drunkards and braggarts who distrust authority, phonies and the Protestant work ethic. Mr. Matura writes about these people with enormous affection.

'In Trinidad, language is a way people entertain themselves.'

"I grew up in a place," he said, "where the bad guys in a film were the heroes. We did not like Alan Ladd. We liked Jack Palance. The cinema was the only window we had to the outside world. Guys would assume the persona of the character Jack Palance played, and eventually they would acquire the name and be called Palance. A nickname would become the name. The idea of transformation is very much a part of our character, a way of transcending the political and racial and economic restrictions of the society."

Mr. Matura, the son of a Creole mother and an Indian father, dropped out of school at 13. He left Trinidad eight years later because he felt intellectually inhibited. "I wanted to be sophisticated," he said, with more than a twinge of self-mockery in his voice. "I couldn't be sophisticated in Trinidad. They would have driven me out or strung me up. The stereotype that Trinidadians have is that only gay people are interested in culture in any intellectual way. Or worse, they think you're pretending to be better than them by having esthetic tastes."

Like the character of Ken in "Playboy of the West Indies," Mr. Matura became something — in his case, a playwright — by saying it was so. "In London, I was hanging out with friends who were budding actors," he recalled. "This was the mid-1960's, where everybody was a budding something. You could become the writer, you could become the actor, you were allowed to bud. There was a kind of gap in the 60's where a lot of people could try to become what they wanted without the necessary educational qualifications.

"I learned to write by writing. I read a lot, although I didn't read plays. I read novels and would always skip the descriptive stuff and go straight to the dialogue because that's how I knew what was going on in a scene. I think England is good for writing. It is cold and wet and dark. There is nothing else to do." ☐

Ismail Merchant Tries A Different Job: Director

By ANNA KYTHREOTIS

BHOPAL, India

THE DEMOLITION OF A wall is being filmed. Almost in slow motion, a few bricks tumble noiselessly to the ground. There is a stillness, then an avalanche of masonry, and a cloud of dust eclipses the whole crew.

The wall symbolizes the inexorable collapse of a culture; that the fate of an inanimate object can seem so significant immediately attests to the pedigree of the film. "In Custody" is a Merchant-Ivory picture, but the dust-shrouded figure that rises triumphantly from the director's chair is not James Ivory, who directed such classic Merchant-Ivory films as "A Room With a View" and "Howards End." It is Ismail Merchant, in a departure from his usual role of producer.

Mr. Merchant, who has often produced films about India, had no aspirations to direct a movie until he read the Anita Desai novel "In Custody" six years ago. It tells of the relationship between a great Urdu poet in decline and a diffident college lecturer who comes to interview him. The link between the two is the Urdu language and its poetry; the poet is resigned to its loss, the lecturer committed to its preservation. "The material inspired me," said Mr. Merchant. "I didn't even bother to option the book. I bought it outright."

Of the subject of the novel, Mr. Merchant said, "It's very sad to see beautiful things go and be unable to stop it. Even if it is only a drop in the ocean, it is important that you have a voice."

With an Indian cast, a screenplay generously filled with couplets and verses, and a budget of less than $1 million, "In Custody" does not suggest that Merchant-Ivory Productions has been transformed by the success of "Howards End" last year or its recent financing and distribution deal with Disney's Touchstone Pictures. (Distribution arrangements for "In Custody," to be released in the fall, are not complete.)

"We have never been influenced by commercial considerations, and our association with the studios won't change that," said Mr. Merchant, whose brother-in-law, Wahid Chowhan, is producing "In Custody." "We have always been committed to making films that have something to say."

'In Custody,' shot in India, is the film maker's homage to his heritage.

Mr. Merchant sees this film as a homage to his heritage. "It is such an inspiring subject and one that I felt so close to that I couldn't have given it to anyone else to direct," he said. "I wanted to express something about my feelings for the language and the culture through this story."

Urdu is spoken by tens of millions of Indians, mostly in the northwest, and is Mr. Merchant's native tongue. It is a lyrical language of metaphor and symbolism, of poets and scholars. "The pulse of the film is the language," Mr. Merchant said. "It is what drives the characters."

In the political conflict between India's Hindus and Muslims, Urdu is perceived as the language of Muslims. "By associating language with religion, politicians are using it as propaganda," said Mr. Merchant. "But Urdu is not a religion. It is a language, a culture, both of Muslims and Hindus. Earlier politicians like Nehru and Gandhi advocated and worked toward the peaceful coexistence of all religions and cultures in India. But present-day politicians are using the strong religious feelings that exist in this country to create animosities for their own ends. It is a dangerous policy that is destroying the country."

Against all advice, Mr. Merchant chose to shoot the film in Bhopal, the site of the devastating Union Carbide gas explosion in 1984. It was also one of the cities hardest hit by violence and arson after the destruction of the Ayodhya mosque by Hindu extremists last year. The curfew had barely been lifted when Mr. Merchant assembled his crew at the location early this year.

"When I came here for the first time to scout locations, I knew it was right," he said. "I didn't want to see any other place. The story called for a location where Muslim culture and Mogul architecture flourished. This used to be a Muslim state, and Urdu is still widely spoken here."

As an exemplar of the decay of a culture, Bhopal, sadly, is ideal. Its lake may appear magnificent, but it is polluted beyond cleansing. With no money available for restoration, the city's imposing, stately buildings have been left to waste away.

Mr. Merchant said he found the experience of directing a feature film here "sometimes very daunting." His previous work as a director includes a 30-minute television film called "Mahatma and the Mad Boy" (1974) and the acclaimed documentary "The Courtesans of Bombay" (1983).

"Ideas expressed by good writers appear to be simple," he said, "but when you come to film them, you realize how complex they are and how difficult it is to put all the undertones into visual terms."

Normally plump and seemingly benign, Mr. Merchant shed 15 pounds while making his film and displayed a corresponding increase in artistic volatility. He cut scenes ruthlessly if they didn't work, or suddenly adapted them to take advantage of an unusual location, a striking face, a new idea. "Beyond having a sketch in my mind, a kind of blueprint, I don't preplan," he said. "Things happen spontaneously and show you other perspectives. I like being open to those possibilities, incorporating unexpected elements into a scene."

The montage of shots that open the film — Bhopal's lake and its dramatic sunset, the decaying architecture of the Mogul palace that serves as the poet's home, and the sounds and texture of the city — is not the scene originally intended. "But how could I waste all this?" Mr. Merchant asked, standing in front of the palace and spreading his arms expansively.

Mr. Ivory, who customarily occupies the director's chair during a Merchant-Ivory production, was an early visitor to the set and watched the action from the sidelines. "New directors can be plagued by experienced actors who know it all, but there was never any doubt about who was boss," he said. "Ismail has a real flair for moving actors around — more than I had when I made my first film."

Although "In Custody" fits comfortably in the Merchant-Ivory idiom, and Mr. Merchant has had the advantage of observing his partner at work for more than three decades, he is nonetheless a film maker with his own points to make and his own way of making them.

"Ismail should give his actors more time," said Shashi Kapoor, who plays the poet, Nur, and has been in several Merchant-Ivory films, including the first one, "The Householder" (1963). "But I like his confidence as a director. He knew what he wanted, and he got it."

Before Merchant-Ivory began adapting E. M. Forster novels ("Maurice," "A Room With a View," "Howards End"), Mr. Merchant had built a reputation with Indian-themed movies made for international audiences, like "Shakespeare Wallah" (1965), "Bombay Talkie" (1970), "Hullabaloo Over Georgie and Bonnie's Pictures" (1979) and "Heat and Dust" (1983). Now he is planning to produce three more films to be made in India.

The heart of the film is the Urdu language and a culture's collapse.

"I will direct again if a good book or a good story comes along," he said.

Asked why he had waited so long to direct a feature film, he grinned. "Oh," he replied, "I thought I'd give Mr. Ivory a chance to get established first before putting him up against really serious competition." □

Anna Kythreotis writes about film for The Times of London and The Sunday Times.

Ross McElwee's Long March to the Screen

By EVE M. KAHN

BROOKLINE, Mass.

AT LEAST ONCE EVERY DECADE, the film maker Ross McElwee bares his soul on screen. The last time he did so, seven years ago in the documentary "Sherman's March," he wove the story of his own hapless search for a girlfriend into that of William T. Sherman's bitter trail of Civil War victories. Vincent Canby, writing in The Times, called it "a deadpan, dryly comic movie."

Since then, Mr. McElwee (pronounced MAC-el-wee) has recovered from fame and overhauled his well-examined life, somewhat. He's now married to Marilyn Levine, a documentary film maker, and is the father of a 4-year-old son, Adrian.

Yet Mr. McElwee is still drawn to the maturation process — his own and everyone else's — and to the ramifications of life and love. His "Time Indefinite," which opens on Wednesday at the Film Forum in Manhattan, covers the post-"Sherman's March" years, from his own wedding to a relative's death to his son's birth to a friend's 50th anniversary.

His new film is another foray into the irony, misery and elation of his own eccentric past.

Mr. McElwee belongs, then, to the school of personal cinéma vérité, populated by the likes of Ed Pincus (whose 1980 film "Diaries" explores his own marriage) and Michael Moore of "Roger and Me" fame. All of them explore the irony, misery and elation in the quotidian. But according to Alfred Guzzetti, chairman of Harvard University's visual and environmental studies department, Mr. McElwee has gone even further.

In introducing "Time Indefinite" at its premiere in March at Harvard (where Mr. McElwee has been a teacher and artist in residence since 1982), Mr. Guzzetti said, "Ross really changed, for our time, the possibilities of the voice for nonfiction film" and demonstrated that we can "still think deeply about" the quirkiness of things that happen to us. Or, as Mr. McElwee himself puts it, it is possible to film "an approximation of the truth that's also of interest to someone other than yourself."

Steve Lewis for The New York Times

Ross McElwee, whose "Time Indefinite" opens on Wednesday—A christening, a Jehovah's Witness and an exterminator.

In person he comes across the same as on screen: He has a soft voice, is slightly awkward and exudes politeness. "His view of life is a rare combination of the sardonic and the sunny, the hopeful," says his wife. Both in their early 40's, the couple share an unpretentious 80-year-old house in Brookline, near Boston, with their son, who appears in "Time Indefinite" as an infant.

Mr. McElwee often takes years to amass footage for his films, and years more to shape it. His first major work was "Charleen" (1978), about an exuberant, big-hearted poetry teacher he has known since high school and her tortured romance with a much younger engineer named Jim. (Reminiscences about Jim's later suicide course somberly through "Time Indefinite.")

Since then, Mr. McElwee has bounced between introspective films and studies of the wider world: "Space Coast" (1979) focused on Cape Canaveral and "Backyard" (1981) on his own background. (He grew up in North Carolina, a son of a prominent surgeon who, on film, often looks ready to scold Mr. McElwee for not being a doctor.)

"Sherman's March" grew out of romantic trauma: Mr. McElwee's girlfriend abandoned him soon after he had won a grant to film the path Sherman took to the sea. Instead, he filmed conversations with old flames as well as new ones he met along the trail, stopping every few towns to explain the havoc Sherman caused, the South's enduring victim complex and Sherman's misgivings about his accomplishments.

"I just wanted it to work for me," he says. "I never thought it would be seen as widely as it was." The film was shown nationally. Hundreds of fans sent letters, a few requesting phone numbers of the unattached women Mr. McElwee met but most asking how they, too, could document their lives. People magazine dubbed him "the year's most offbeat success story"; every major movie studio called, wondering if Mr. McElwee would consider moving West and turning commercial. Or perhaps he would at least send them a tape of his work. "I could tell, if I'd gone out there, it would have been a very short marriage," he says. Success's main impact on his life: "It became much easier to get grants."

He spent his first round of grants on "Something to Do With the Wall," a collaboration with Ms. Levine about the Berlin wall's destruction that was released in 1991. (The title comes from a Berliner's speculation on the source of the city's energy.) Vincent Canby called it "reporting of a most pertinent and genially eccentric order," but its appeal was not exactly broad.

Mr. McElwee has since concentrated on "Time Indefinite," which progresses in what he calls "movements." Light-hearted sequences (for example, a fumbling exchange of rings at his wedding, a visit from Killo Exterminators) lead to brief blackouts followed by meditations on mortality (vintage footage of his own christening, a Jehovah's Witness at the door warning him that we all face a "time indefinite" on this planet).

Mr. McElwee's next project, "Six O'Clock News," will recount a seven-week cross-country trip he took in 1987, interviewing people who had appeared fleetingly on local news broadcasts, such as a Korean immigrant whose wife was murdered soon after they arrived in America. Mr. McElwee is also teaching the next generation of "young people interested in picking up the ball of patient, observational, languid film making." Those intrigued by their own pasts, he adds, are especially fortunate: "The thing about hometown movies is that nobody from anywhere else, no matter how much money they have, can make them."

A study of his son might follow "Six O'Clock News," but not soon. He has declared a semi-moratorium on family filming, to save money and to spend more unself-conscious time with his son. "I know I sound like every idiot father who ever walked the earth, but seeing the world through his eyes, it's miraculous," he says, and then he calls Adrian into the room. The boy wriggles into his father's lap and says that someday he wants to make movies about "people I like."

His father looks down, a smile just visible behind his thick beard, and says, "I wish I were filming right now." □

DANCE VIEW/Jack Anderson

Demonic Choreographers, Angelic Ballerinas

CHOREOGRAPHERS CAN SEEM like meanies. They give ballerinas such daunting things to do. But great choreographers are really softies. Even as they tax ballerinas, they bestow riches on them. Take, for instance, the challenges of such classics as "The Sleeping Beauty," "Swan Lake" and "Giselle."

All three ballets are grueling to perform. Nonetheless, ballerinas and audiences adore them. "The Sleeping Beauty" is in the spring repertory of both American Ballet Theater and the New York City Ballet. Ballet Theater is also doing "Swan Lake," which the San Francisco Ballet offered earlier this year at the New York State Theater. And the Dance Theater of Harlem's "Giselle" delighted audiences at the State Theater this winter.

The title character of "Giselle" is surely the most eloquent starring part in these ballets. But its demands are enormous. Any dancer who attempts it must know how to invest technical expertise with a multitude of dramatic nuances. Giselle is first seen as an innocent peasant hopelessly in love with a mysterious stranger; then she suffers from physical as well as emotional heart pangs; shortly thereafter, she goes mad and dies — all this in the first act alone. In the second act, Giselle returns as a ghost and saves her lover from evil spirits.

Even though the steps of a classic may be daunting, the heroine invariably reaps rewards.

The many facets of characterization and the varied steps required to express them could bewilder dancers. But few ballerinas are failures in "Giselle." Clearly, Jean Coralli and Jules Perrot knew what they were doing when they choreographed it in 1841.

The sheer variety of steps for Giselle enables performers who are not at home in one aspect of the role to emphasize others. The interpretive possibilities are almost unlimited. Thus, Alicia Alonso was a passionate Giselle, Carla Fracci was frail, and Margot Fonteyn sweet. And just as mature, gifted actresses can be convincing as Shakespeare's Juliet, so can sensitive, older dancers look miraculously youthful as Giselle. Both Alonso and Galina Ulanova, when no longer youngsters, were memorable Giselles.

"Swan Lake" is varied in its own way. Strictly speaking, it has two female starring parts: Odette, the enchanted Swan Queen, and Odile, the sorcerer's daughter who disguises herself as Odette. Because the choreography for Odette flows and Odile's steps flash, companies occasionally assign these characters to two temperamentally distinct ballerinas. Yet ever since the premiere of this work, choreographed by Lev Ivanov and Marius Petipa in 1895, it has been customary for the same star to portray both women. The dual role allows her to be doubly effective.

Of course, lyrical dancers are not necessarily coruscating technicians, and some technicians fail to be lyrical. Such limitations may not be insuperable if a ballerina can shine in one of the two roles. Provided she is not hopelessly at sea in the other, her weaknesses will probably be excused. Whereas some dancegoers thought Maya Plisetskaya an icy Odette, she struck sparks as Odile. And although Fonteyn could wobble in Odile's virtuoso passages, she was a sublimely tender Odette. As a result, both Plisetskaya and Fonteyn are fondly remembered in "Swan Lake."

In terms of sheer difficulty, the choreography for Princess Aurora in "The Sleeping Beauty" presents ballerinas with the most formidable challenges of any of the classics. That's one reason why the dance fans who excitedly compared the Auroras of Darci Kistler, Judith Fugate, Kyra Nichols and Margaret Tracey at City Ballet earlier this season will be eager to watch Cynthia Harvey, Susan Jaffe and Amanda McKerrow, who are currently dancing Aurora for Ballet Theater.

Petipa, who created the ballet in 1890, does not bring Aurora onstage often. Nevertheless, whenever she is present, he keeps her busy. Almost as soon as Aurora enters, she has a brief allegro solo, followed by an absolutely fiendish sequence: the Rose Adagio, in which the princess is required to sustain balances while suitors present her with flowers. Each pose must be perfect, and even the slightest unsteadiness will be noticeable. What's more, the ballerina must appear radiant throughout. Fonteyn's glowing stage presence in the adagio remains legendary. But the aristocratic dignity of Irina Kolpakova was also impressive.

Should a ballerina emerge from her Rose Adagio ordeal unscathed and still smiling, she will find that the audience is now on her side. She will doubtless be cheered on in other episodes, including the passage in which Aurora pricks her finger on the evil fairy's spindle and the vision scene in which she appears before the prince as an ideal woman.

Problems multiply once more in the final pas de deux. If the ballerina has grown tired from her exertions, she may dance the pas de deux with technical caution. No matter. Dancegoers appreciative of her efforts throughout the ballet will forgive a moment of weariness. Or the ballerina may be so relieved that the work is almost over and so elated by her triumph thus far that, in a burst of creative energy, she and her partner bring the duet to an exalted conclusion.

"The Sleeping Beauty," like "Giselle" and "Swan Lake," is filled with snares. And, like those ballets, it abounds with riches. The choreographers who can seem malevolent wizards because they devise such demanding steps ultimately prove benign magicians. □

Martha Swope/American Ballet Theater

Susan Jaffe is one of Ballet Theater's Princess Auroras in "The Sleeping Beauty" this season—The role offers the most formidable challenges of any of the classics.

The Stage Journey From Rock Opera To Broadway Show

lighting effect that turns the whole theater into a huge pinball machine to last 11 seconds instead of 7.

"This was not the work of a pair of fantasists returning to the late 60's," said the 40-year-old Mr. McAnuff of his collaboration with the 47-year-old Mr. Townshend. "We wanted to do a dramatic version of this piece."

FINISHED SAYING GOODnight to the cast and crew, Mr. McAnuff had been surprised by an autograph seeker at the stage door as he headed for a restaurant near the theater. Now, settled down to dissect "Tommy" over a late-night chicken sandwich, he worked a scene from "Henry IV" into a long explanation of his own "Acid Queen" sequence (one of several in which little Tommy is exposed to strong stimuli — in this case, a drug-addicted prostitute who may have magical powers — that could break his silence). "You've got to turn to the great teacher when you dramatize something," he said jokingly. "I don't mean to be pretentious, but I just can't help it."

He looked pleasantly tired, having "almost outlasted John Entwistle" (the Who's bassist) during opening-night festivities at an Irish bar the night before. He would also have looked inconspicuous without the appliquéd leather jacket in a bold zebra-like pattern, a garment he took off instantly when asked about its origins. "The producers gave it to me," he said diplomatically. "I think it, um, evokes the show's logo."

The jacket was indeed evocative, though not nearly as much as "Tommy" is itself. The Who's rock opera is so firmly rooted in memories of its era that any Broadway modifications were bound to provoke complaints. Some have suggested that this 90's "Tommy," with its gentler, family-minded ending, betrays the toughness of both the 60's and the Who.

"That's the typical self-destructive side of the intellectual left," replied Mr. McAnuff to that criticism. "Often, we've allowed the right wing to abscond with basic notions like family or patriotism. We just sit back and allow them to do it, accepting that it must be correct. I've never met anybody who didn't consider families important. Just on that level alone I reject it." He went on to note: "We were well aware there would be audience members who felt that they kind of own this piece."

But he emphasized how elliptical the original album actually is about family values and many other things. The 1969 "Tommy" is a series of songs, packaged in an order Mr. Townshend never considered sacred. And several of them are sung by characters whose identity is never made clear. Some are performed in a manner that would not work in any other format. It was Mr. Townshend himself, after all, who first sang the part of the Acid Queen.

Mr. McAnuff said he approached "Tommy" without preconceptions and without borrowing from Ken Russell's delirious (and now dated) 1975 film. He was aware, however, of the extent to which the film had been dominated by none-too-musical stars singing cameo turns and was glad to escape such limitations. In adapting "Tommy" for the stage (his first version had its premiere last July at the La Jolla Playhouse), he and Mr. Townshend concentrated on character development, dramatic momentum and creating a song order that made more sense.

The show is fast-paced enough to keep its crew jumping backstage. "It's constant motion, nobody gets to sit on the bench," said the director, who also co-wrote the book with Mr. Townshend. In fact, it is the show's speed that, in Mr. McAnuff's mind, is one of the most unusual aspects of "Tommy," along with its seamless structure. From the opening note of the overture, which startles the audience into attention before the house lights have dimmed, this "Tommy" exerts more visceral control over its audience than most Broadway musicals can. "Once we saw the response it was getting, I must admit I did ask them to turn it up a little louder," he said gleefully of that initial jolt.

Mr. McAnuff also chose deliberately to keep each act racing forward without pausing to invite audience response. "It takes a certain amount of skill to achieve the thunderous applause you often require at the end of a musical number," he said. "But we didn't want audiences to feel required to respond that way, because we needed to keep their concentration inside the story." Once the structure was decided, Mr. McAnuff came across a remark by Gov. Mario Cuomo that he felt made the same point. "He said that the three greatest speeches he'd ever made didn't get applause until the end, and I thought: 'That's it. That's absolutely right.' "

When "Tommy" does prompt sudden audience reaction, it's the staging that generates the excitement. Audiences especially warm to an opening sequence encapsulating World War II into a five-minute prologue, during which parachutists suddenly fall through the cloud-covered floor. (The stage of the St. James was rebuilt to accommodate trap doors and underground winches, and a new doorway was opened for quick entrances at stage right.) "I'm very pleased, but it's a 2,500-year-old device," Mr. McAnuff said of the trap-door trick.

More fundamental innovations involved the music itself. "We had a shortage of choral numbers in the piece, and from the beginning I looked for ways to open up the score chorally," Mr. McAnuff said, explaining how a once minor solo like "Sensation" could be expanded into a show-stopper. Originally sung by a lone Tommy, it now incorporates Beach Boys-type harmonies and "West Side Story"-like choreography from the chorus of teen-age characters Mr. McAnuff calls "the Louts." The production also works cathedral scenes and a chorus into its "Christmas" number. And it turns the Sonny Boy Williamson song "Eyesight to the Blind" (the only non-Who material on the album) into a scorching duet featuring a harmonica solo.

That last alteration was a happy accident. Lee Morgan, one of the actors, had learned to play the harmonica while holding a pizza-delivery job, and the director decided to work the sound into this blues number. He also turned "Eyesight to the Blind" into a simple lead-in for "Acid Queen" (whereas Ken Russell had used it to create a wildly profane church sequence involving the worship of Marilyn Monroe). Mr. McAnuff staged "Acid Queen" itself against a plain magenta backdrop, dispensing with the 18 panels that present constantly changing images during the rest of the show. "When you're working with projections," he said of the ingenious visuals supplied by Wendall K. Harrington, "you reach a point where there's nothing more you can do except get rid of them." Indeed, this "Tommy" aims as much for restraint as it does for inventiveness.

In designing 'Tommy,' the emphasis was on the visuals and a swift-moving story line.

Restraint was a major concern when it came to Cousin Kevin and Uncle Ernie, Tommy's abusive relatives, and to the children who play Tommy at ages 4 and 10 (the 4-year-old is played by two little girls). The episode of sexual abuse involving 10-year-old Tommy and his wicked Uncle Ernie is staged in a notably discreet manner, especially in comparison to the film. (Keith Moon played the character as a raving pervert and ended the "Fiddle About" number with a corset on his head.) Onstage, the episode is merely suggested when Uncle Ernie carries the boy to a bed and the bed itself begins to spin.

Mr. McAnuff expressed anger at complaints that the show's subtler version of the scene is somehow less daring. "That's a real little boy up there," he said. "Does anyone actually need me to abuse that child to get the idea across?"

Early in the process of staging "Tommy," he discussed the scene with both his 10-year-old actor and the understudy. "We had a talk, the way you would as a parent if you were warning your children about people to watch out for," he said. "I told them we were portraying this to condemn it, not to condone it, and that we would do it in a way that didn't rob them as actors of any dignity."

Perhaps because the director's own father, an R.A.F. Spitfire pilot, died in a car crash six months before his son was born, Mr. McAnuff was particularly careful in restoring Mr. Townshend's original notion of Tommy's childhood trauma. Though the film showed Tommy witnessing his father's death at the hands of his mother's lover, Mr. Townshend had always imagined Tommy's father as the survivor. By embracing the latter version, the show can turn the Walker parents into fuller characters. (Though not without some difficulty: Dates that establish the 1940's time frame in the show turn Tommy's mother into a 16-year-old bride. "Maybe we'll fix that before the show goes on tour," Mr. McAnuff said.)

The director ascribes the musical's expanded interest in the older Walkers to the fact that its creators are now in their 40's. And Mr. McAnuff attributes some of its less messianic bent to the personal growth of Mr. Townshend, who had credited an "avatar" for the original "Tommy" album. "I think his beliefs have evolved and changed," said Mr. McAnuff. "God, whose haven't?"

Several days later, Mr. McAnuff was back in La Jolla, after it was announced that his playhouse will be awarded a Tony in June as an outstanding resident theater company. He was also in limbo. His apartment in La Jolla has been sublet and his place on the Lower East Side is, too. In New York he has lately moved into an apartment near the St. James with his wife, the actress Susan Berman (who starred in Susan Seidelman's film "Smithereens"), and their 2-year-old daughter, Julia.

The place is only temporary, but it has one big advantage: a direct view of the "Tommy" billboard above the theater. "That way, we can point right out the window and show her where Daddy's going to be," Mr. McAnuff said. But that view could have been a mixed blessing. "It sure would have been awful if the show had been a dog," he said. □

Can the Philharmonic Conquer The Angst of 'Der Freischütz'?

By KENNETH FURIE

TO NEW YORK'S MAJOR opera companies, "Der Freischütz" must resemble an ill-mannered house guest who has repaid their kindly invitations by busting up the furniture and leaving cigarette burns in the carpet. Prospects for a return invitation to either home any time soon seem dim.

So Carl Maria von Weber's ungrateful opera has had to find another route back into town. On Thursday evening, Sir Colin Davis conducts the first of three concert performances with the New York Philharmonic at Avery Fisher Hall.

"Disgraceful," Sir Colin said recently of New York's continued neglect of an opera he has championed throughout his career. Early on, he performed it in concert form in London. Later he conducted productions at Sadler's Wells and at Covent Garden. In 1990, he recorded "Freischütz" with Weber's own orchestra, the Dresden Staatskapelle, and he is looking forward to a production next year in Dresden, where the composer became director of music in 1817.

Given the absence of "Freischütz" from the New York stage, it occurred to Sir Colin that the Philharmonic's 150th-anniversary season might provide an opportunity to make an event of the opera — to allow audiences "to hear how good it is," he said.

The curious thing about the marginal repertory status of "Freischütz" is that hardly anyone disputes the opera's stature. With its premiere in Berlin in 1821, Weber not only put German opera on the map but also set an agenda for some 80 years' worth of musical Romanticism.

First off, he expanded the musical language and the orchestral and vocal resources he inherited from Mozart and Beethoven. The inspirational reach of his imagination is obvious in the work of Liszt, Mendelssohn, Berlioz and Wagner, and must have been felt directly or indirectly by almost every serious composer of the 19th century.

In one way, at least, Weber's great but intractable opera may gain from a concert presentation.

Carl Maria von Weber, painted by Caroline Bardua—His 1821 opera set an agenda for musical Romanticism.

Walter H. Scott

Sir Colin Davis, a longtime advocate of "Der Freischütz."

Weber's Romantic sensibility was undoubtedly stimulated by the combination of rural and supernatural elements in a ghost story he found as early as 1810. The Freischütz, or "free-shooter," is an expert marksman, Max, who suddenly finds himself unable to hit any target and is lured by a fellow huntsman, Caspar, into a pact to cast demonically powered "free-bullets."

Caspar's enlistment of the hapless Max to the service of his demonic master, Samiel, forms the principal action of Act I. This plot arc is completed in grand fashion in the second scene of Act II: at midnight in the Wolf's Glen, Caspar summons Samiel for the casting of the free-bullets. Even by the high standard of invention Weber maintained elsewhere in the score, he outdid himself in the Wolf's Glen scene, which has never been bettered as a musical representation of the relationship between the natural and the supernatural.

Of course, since this is a Romantic opera, there is a virginal heroine, and she comes with a perky coloratura sidekick. The first scene of Act II introduces Agathe, the daughter of Cuno, the head forester. As Agathe waits anxiously for Max, her fiancé, her cousin Ännchen tries to comfort her.

Anxiety is a normal state for "Freischütz" and its characters. "It's a piece about angst," Sir Colin suggested, directing attention to the opera's setting: shortly after the 30 Years' War, a period of singular brutality. "The young people in the opera had known nothing but war," he said. "When things are going badly, anything sets people off."

A sense of expectation and dread permeates "Freischütz," beginning with the overture, one of the greatest in all of opera. Spend any time with the score, and you are bound to be overwhelmed by its unceasing freshness and ingenuity — and the practicality of this ingenuity.

To pick an obvious example, consider the galumphing "oom-pah-pah" waltz that rounds off the opening-scene festivities, in which Max has been thoroughly humiliated by the peasant Kilian in a shooting contest. While the dance imparts some amiable flavor of the local folk, it also communicates a sense of how this whole scene is playing for Max. Then, as darkness falls and Max is left alone, Weber transforms the fading "pah-pah" of the waltz into a rhythmic figuration for the violas that propels Max into his great monologue of frustration and despair.

So where is the problem? Why does such a brilliant and important opera so often reduce well-meaning companies to damage control when they eventually have a go at it?

In fairness, "Freischütz" contains a number of traps. To begin with, there is the basic "singspiel" form, employing spoken dialogue rather than sung recitative — a form that always poses problems for grand-opera companies. On the simplest level, at least, a concert performance gets around this problem by substituting narration for the dialogue.

This is also not an easy opera to cast. Weber was already laying the groundwork for the heavier-weight voice types Wagner would use, though without yet abandoning the florid idiom of Mozart. It is no accident that the loveliest Agathe of recent times, Elisabeth Grümmer, who appears in the outstanding EMI recording conducted by Joseph Keilberth, is also known as a singularly lovely Elisabeth ("Tannhäuser") and Elsa ("Lohengrin").

And Max clearly represents the prototype for Wagner's heldentenor: a voice of considerable size and presence as well as lyric quality. Something like the intended effect can be heard from August Seider, in the extended excerpts recorded by Polydor in 1943, and from Reiner Goldberg, in a 1985 live recording from Dresden on Denon.

Otherwise, the usual choice is between a beefy but hardly bearable tenor and a lyric voice that is often overwhelmed and cannot delineate phrases with the necessary strength. It is significant that an uningratiating singer like Rudolf Schock emerges as a plausible compromise, in both the Keilberth version and the excellent Eurodise recording conducted by Lovro von Matacic.

Caspar seems plainly meant for a true singing bass; any doubt should be dispelled by Michael Bohnen's heroic 1930 recordings of the Act I drinking song and monologue. But given the role's upward reach and required agility, the usual compromise is a niche bass-baritone, somebody who mops up the roles the quality basses and baritones pass by — like Ekkehard Wlaschiha, who sang a tremendous Caspar in the 1985 Dresden recording, re-recorded the role with Sir Colin and will join him this week.

Still, the opera can be cast. The Met's 1972 lineup seemed reasonable: Pilar Lorengar as Agathe, Sandor Konya as Max and Gerd Feldhoff (in fact quite good) as Caspar. Yet it was a bust. True, the conductor was a disaster, but a lot of top-notch conductors have come to grief in "Freischütz," which has all the trappings of a conductor's opera. There are broadcast performances from Wilhelm Furtwängler and Erich Kleiber in which hardly anything happens, and on records such canny pros as Eugen Jochum and Rafael Kubelik have seemed stumped.

Inevitably, questions about "Freischütz" seem to zero in on how easily the characters and situations can be reduced to stereotypes, set against a backdrop of country corn. Indeed, the opera's relative durability in German houses may have less to do with superior appreciation than with higher tolerance for the native brand of folksy cuteness.

AND IT'S NOT THAT CUTENESS is built into the score. As suggested, the opening scene characterizes both Max's objective surroundings and his subjective response to them. But getting this in performance is hard work, and that violates the Unwritten Law of Operatic Presentation, which dictates that clichés and surface effects should always be preferred to work that proceeds from more substantial investigation.

Nor does "Freischütz" take kindly to conductors who proudly announce each felicity they discover in the score (as Carlos Kleiber does in his Deutsche Grammophon recording). What, then, is to be done with all those riches on the printed page?

As a small example, listen to Agathe waiting for Max in Act II, after Ännchen leaves the room. Two little clarinet phrases punctuate the musings that will blossom into her great aria "Leise, leise" — a piece that must have been playing in Verdi's head when he came to imagine the music for Desdemona's final prayer in "Otello." Each clarinet phrase is a mere four notes, yet in them a clarinetist, singer and conductor who are attuned to the music's human sources can unleash an expressive power that other composers would be hard put to match in an entire opera.

Weber composed only two more operas before he died in 1826, not yet 40. Of course there is no way of imagining what he might ultimately have accomplished. But the Philharmonic performances may provide a chance to hear what he did accomplish — to hear how good "Freischütz" is. □

To the Met: Well Done. Do More.

WHAT SHOULD WE EXPECT FROM THE Metropolitan Opera? And what have we received of late? The season ended last weekend with the twilight of Wagner's gods; some people talk about the Met as though it deserved a similar send-off. For all the triumph of the Wagner "Ring" performances, overall attendance dropped this season (to 89 percent of capacity, from 92 percent last season), and there was many a mundane evening (including the first performances of Rossini's "Semiramide" and Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera"). It would be easy to compile a damning list of callow tenors, worn sopranos, uneven casts, dull conductors, misjudged theatrics, neglected opportunities.

But the Met's track record this season was actually one that any company in the world might envy. It included the revival of a 1964 production of Verdi's "Falstaff" in a sterling performance that almost made it seem as if Paul Plishka, Marilyn Horne and Mirella Freni were part of a polished repertory company — alert to one another and to the score. Otto Schenk's new production of Wagner's "Meistersinger" was suffused with good sense and exceptional ensemble work; its Nuremburg included Hermann Prey, Donald McIntyre and Karita Mattila. To my ears, "Die Walküre" was the musical standard-bearer for the Met "Ring," and the Met orchestra played it nearly seamlessly. And all of these Verdi and Wagner performances were conducted with authoritative breadth and supple energy by James Levine.

In addition, Janacek's "Jenufa" was treated as a powerful but intimate chamber opera, in which Gabriela Benackova's Jenufa and Leonie Rysanek's Kostelnicka effectively dismantled the pastoral image of village life. Elijah Moshinsky's new production of Richard Strauss's "Ariadne auf Naxos," despite tendencies toward excess, created a pungent backstage atmosphere for the prologue and a haunting aura for the opera-within-the-opera. There were distinctive individual achievements as well: Ms. Freni, in the letter scene of Tchaikovsky's "Yevgeny Onegin," conveyed girlish innocence through mature artistry; Christian Thielemann made an impressive conducting debut in Strauss's "Rosenkavalier."

The Met even took a few risks, giving avant-garde gestures an institutional polish. Francesca Zambello's loudly booed production of Donizetti's "Lucia di Lammermoor" featured June Anderson in an affecting performance of the title role; the staging compensated for odd attempts at psychodrama with revealing insight into character. And though Philip Glass's "Voyage" stumbled along with an inadequate libretto, the Met spared no effort to bring it to life.

This is an imposing list of achievements. In an era in which great voices are few and good casts rare, here were at least a half-dozen examples of superb musical and dramatic accomplishment. It may be unreasonable to ask for more. Moreover, the Met's financial structure, which this past season imposed a $128 million budget and the need to fill a 3,800-seat house for 221 performances, proves a constraint as well as an opportunity. It limits experimentation and encourages conservatism. Within those bounds, Mr. Levine's artistic direction has fulfilled a long-term goal: the Met is an unmatched institutional representative of the grand operatic tradition.

A season of enviable achievements leaves plenty of work still to be accomplished.

Given what the Met has achieved, though, why not hope for more? Why not, for example, modify what has become a house style? A tendency toward busyness haunts all productions. This is partly because the Met has — wrongly, I think — refused to adopt supertitles, so singers and directors often exaggerate to communicate with an audience. The bustle is also caused by the Met's need to impress an audience without reliance on stars. It betrays a sense of anxiety. "The Voyage," for example, might have been more effective if produced with less spectacle and less gimmickry. This lack of faith can appear even in traditional works: Donizetti's "Elisir d'Amore" turned to coloring-book kitsch to amplify the music's charms.

A counterpart to the tendency to overproduce is a tendency to underreflect, to rely on effect rather than interpretation; this is one of the flaws of Mr. Schenk's Wagner productions. During an era in which opera is evolving chiefly through its staging innovations, the Met's dramatic taste can seem almost quaint. When something venturesome is tried, more oversight is also required. Many of the obvious blunders in "Lucia" could easily have been avoided without violating its ideas.

The Met could also begin to assume its role as the national artistic leader. What about repertory festivals, more commissioned operas, a chamber opera company (a recurrent idea that has come to naught) and a greater representation of American operatic talent? The Met has something to learn from its smaller counterparts, as well as from Gérard Mortier's Salzburg Festival in Austria, which is trying to combine Met-like budgets with exploratory programming.

The gap left by the Met's shortcomings is not negligible. In fact, the New York City Opera has long wanted to fill it (though as that company approaches its 50th-anniversary season, worried rumors predict that it may never have a 51st). But until a critic's utopian wishes are satisfied, Mr. Levine and the Met still deserve vigorous acclaim for their impressive artistic accomplishments and curatorial seriousness; the rest is bound to be easier. □

CD's Hit the Road in Bigger Numbers

By HANS FANTEL

GETTING THE CAR spruced up for spring has been an American ritual since the days of Henry Ford's tin lizzie. This year, the seasonal overhaul may well involve updating the car's sound system for the digital era.

After all, traveling is often the best time for undisturbed listening. In fact, more music is heard in cars than in concert, and with Americans averaging 15 percent of their waking time behind the wheel, many listeners think that their car stereo should be on par with their home music system.

Until recently, the main source of music in a car, aside from the radio, was the cassette. But motorized listeners are increasingly turning to compact disks.

Competition is forcing down prices for CD players in automobiles.

With a CD player in the car, travelers no longer need to transfer music from compact disks onto tape to hear their favorite recordings en route. More important, the sound in a car — coming directly from a digital source — has the crispness and clarity to which listeners have become accustomed at home.

The distinct tonal detail that is the hallmark of digital sound is doubly welcome on wheels. With digital, sonic nuances, otherwise drowned in road noise, remain vivid and enliven the texture of the music.

So far, only a few varieties of car CD players have been offered. But this spring, most major manufacturers of car stereo are entering the field, forcing down prices for a radio/CD combination to little more than those for a conventional radio/cassette unit.

Among the least expensive, Clarion's Model 5632 ($350) comes complete with its own amplifier, rated at 12 watts per channel. The Blaupunkt Model Santa Fe ($400) delivers 25 watts per channel and can be removed from its dashboard slot to avoid theft. Another well-designed model, the Panasonic CQ-DP32 ($429), with 22 watts per channel, lets the listener pick any track at random.

These all-in-one designs, which include their own amplifier and fit into a standard dashboard cutout, are simple to install. Yet they are limited in power, and skimpy power reserves are easily overtaxed by the lavish dynamics of digital recordings.

To be assured of unconstrained orchestral outbursts, many listeners choose a more elaborate CD system in which bigger, more powerful amplifiers are mounted separately — usually in the trunk. All that remains in the dashboard is the CD player and radio tuner.

Outstanding models of this kind include the Denon DCC-8570 ($550), the Alpine 7915 ($520) and the Yamaha YCDT-720 ($499). Prices are for the in-dashboard unit only. Add another $200 to $600 (depending on power ratings) for the separate trunk-mounted amplifier, which enables the music to override road and engine noise without distortion, even at highway speeds.

Also in more expensive CD players, the laser beam is more stabilized and won't jump off its narrow track — less than the width of a hair — if the car hits a small bump. (On a major bump or New York-caliber pothole, even the best CD players will skip a beat.)

Unless a cooperative passenger slips in the disk, switching CD's without stopping the car may land the driver in a ditch, or worse. So some listeners prefer automatic CD changers, which can be stocked with 6 to 10 CD's individually selected by touching a dashboard control. Typically, these changers are mounted in the trunk or under the seat. Prices for such units range from $400 to $1,000, with Pioneer, Panasonic, Sony and JVC among the principal brands.

A shortcut to putting CD's on wheels is to plug a portable CD player into an existing car stereo system with a special adapter. The adapter, which is shaped like an ordinary cassette, slips into the cassette slot of a conventional car stereo unit and injects the signal from the portable CD player into the system.

This may be the cheapest way to convert a car stereo system to CD, but it cannot be recommended to the musically fastidious. Most adapters squelch the upper frequencies, depriving the music of sheen and sparkle and forfeiting the advantage of digital sound. □

James Williams—The pianist lets his partners flaunt their individualism.

RECORD BRIEF

James Williams: 'James Williams Meets the Saxophone Masters'

DIW/Columbia 53430; CD and cassette.

For his latest record, the pianist James Williams had an inspiration: He invited a caucus of horn players to interpret a set of jazz tunes. The results are exhilarating. At one point in jazz history, this kind of session might have been called a "cutting contest" — an antagonistic bout in which soloists vie for top-dog status. But Mr. Williams's sidekicks work together; their enthusiasm forges a deep alliance.

The tenor saxophonists George Coleman, Joe Henderson and Billy Pierce move through these pieces as if they were caught in a revolving door, each bounding in and out of the tunes. Seldom is a phrase tossed off, and never does a solo overstay its welcome; everybody plays at his attentive best. The thematic trade-offs on the track "Fourplay" find the improvisers in cahoots, pouncing on intricate motifs. During "The Song Is You," the musicians launch a good-natured attack, goading one another while firing off volley after volley of pronouncements, confessions and queries.

Mr. Wiliams presides over an exchange that's modern in its sophistication; he makes interplay a synonym for ingenuity. Subordinating his own exquisite playing, the pianist lets his partners flaunt their individualism. As they investigate harmonies and ferret out rhythmic nuances, it becomes clear that a jam session is a rare chance to establish camaraderie. JIM MACNIE

POP MUSIC

Jazz and Politics Meet Over the Keyboard

By LARRY ROHTER

SANTO DOMINGO, Dominican Republic

GONZALO RUBALCABA WAS playing "Green Dolphin Street" on a beat-up electric piano at a Havana jazz festival in 1986 when the American bassist Charlie Haden, who has worked with most of the great jazz pianists of the last 30 years, saw him for the first time. He was immediately dazzled. "I fell on the floor and asked, 'Who is that guy,' his solo was so unbelievable," Mr. Haden recalled recently. "He was 23 at the time, but it was like hearing a combination of Art Tatum, Herbie Hancock and Bill Evans."

Since that encounter, which led to a recording contract and invitations with Mr. Haden to perform abroad, musicians and audiences around the world have had much the same response to Mr. Rubalcaba's music, a heady mixture of Latin and classical influences and jazz.

The 30-year-old Cuban pianist has been a featured artist at the Montreux Jazz Festival and performed acoustic piano duets with Chick Corea in Japan. Six of his albums have now been released in the United States to critical acclaim and comparisons to keyboard giants like Keith Jarrett and McCoy Tyner; three albums were recorded with his Cuban fusion group Proyecto through the German label Messidor, and three were piano trios released by Blue Note through a licensing agreement with a Japanese label. A new album, "Suites 4 and 20," is due out later this month on Blue Note.

But because of the mutual emnity between the United States and Fidel Castro, Mr. Rubalcaba (pronounced Roo-bal-CA-bah), like other Cuban artists, has never been able to obtain the visa that would allow him to perform in this country.

The Cuban pianist Gonzalo Rubalcaba sidesteps ideology, preferring to speak through his work.

Angel Perez for The New York Times

Gonzalo Rubalcaba, who makes his American debut on Friday at Alice Tully Hall—He moved to the Dominican Republic because "I needed a space to develop."

The Clinton Administration has taken a different tack, however, and on Friday Mr. Rubalcaba will make his American debut at Alice Tully Hall as part of the "Jazz at Lincoln Center" series organized by Wynton Marsalis. Mr. Rubalcaba will play in three different formats — solo, with Mr. Haden and the drummer Jack de Johnette and as leader of an all-Cuban quartet.

Mr. Rubalcaba still cannot be paid for performances in the United States, and whether the exception granted him will be extended to other Cuban artists remains to be seen. But the magnitude of the moment does not escape him. "It is a political miracle," he said with a grin during an interview at the Santo Domingo apartment where he has lived since last year with his wife, Maria, and two young sons, Joao and Joan.

Cuba hardly ever grants artists the right to live outside the country, to decide when, where or with whom they will perform, or to keep the compensation for their services. That policy of controlling "cultural workers" has contributed to embarrassing defections that have robbed the Castro regime of some of its most prominent artists: the saxophonist Paquito d'Rivera, the trumpeter Arturo Sandoval, the painters Arturo Cuenca and Tomás Esson, and the dancer Jorge Esquivel. But Mr. Rubalcaba is one of Cuba's last internationally recognized cultural treasures and the Government, weakened by growing economic and social problems, has been forced to show unusual flexibility in dealing with him.

"I have not broken with Cuba and do not wish to do so, but neither does my situation follow the habitual model," Mr. Rubalcaba said. "In my specific case, there has been a reciprocal process. I presented myself to the Cuban authorities and told them that this was a time for me to advance my work outside the country, that I needed a space to develop. I had decided that I should be the source of my own economic support, and I told them all the conditions I needed to work, and it produced positive results from the start. I have my family here, but I maintain the connection with my country, which is something important to my work."

As a member of one of Havana's most distinguished musical families, Mr. Rubalcaba is very much aware of, and draws from, his roots in Cuban popular culture. His grandfather, Jacobo, was a conductor and composer remembered today as the author of "El Cadete Constitucional," one of the most famous songs of a style known as danzón. His father, Guillermo, is a well-known pianist who for many years played in the orchestra of Enrique Jorrín, inventor of the cha-cha. As early as age 4, Mr. Rubalcaba joined some of Cuba's finest musicians in jam sessions in his family's living room, playing not piano but his first love, percussion.

"To me at that point, the piano was nothing more than a piece of furniture that decorated the house and at which my older brother sat down to practice five or six hours a day," he said. "What I liked were drums, congas, tambourines, timbales."

By the age of 8, Mr. Rubalcaba was enrolled in a Havana conservatory, where he studied classical piano and Afro-Cuban percussion. He turned professional while still a teen-ager, and by the time he was 20, he had already toured Africa and France as a member of Orquestra Aragón, one of Cuba's most renowned dance bands.

More recently, he has maintained a presence in the pop world through Proyecto and by playing piano on two albums by the Latin music star Juan Luis Guerra and working with salsa and merengue performers in the Dominican Republic, a country he chose as his residence because "the food, the language, the culture, the weather, the racial composition are nearly the same as Cuba's."

In the end, though, Mr. Rubalcaba always comes back to jazz, a form of music eager to absorb Cuban influences. Mr. Rubalcaba was first exposed to swing and be-bop through the 78 r.p.m. records in his father's collection. "I have always been of the opinion that jazz, even more than Cuban music, offers the creative musician the greatest latitude," he said. "It allows one to express oneself with more freedom, and at the moment of sitting down at the instrument it permits a state of virginity that is profoundly refreshing."

THOUGH A FORMIDABLE COMposer himself, Mr. Rubalcaba is fond of taking Latin classics like "Besame Mucho" or "Perfidia" — as well as pop standards ranging from Jerome Kern to the Beatles — and adapting them to his own eclectic purposes. "These are the hymns of our time and our continent," he said. "They have been performed by so many people in so many different forms. They offer a world of subtleties and a means to recapture a time when melody and theme were dominant."

Mr. Rubalcaba's peers admire his quest for artistic freedom, but some, especially Cuban artists exiled in the United States, criticize his political attitudes. "Gonzalito is an incredible, amazing musician, but he is letting them use him," said Mr. d'Rivera, who is now an American citizen. "What they want is to avoid his escaping, so they give him more freedom than anybody in Cuba has. He is trying to live in two worlds, but the contradictions are too great, and a point comes when no matter how nicely you are treated, you have to be embarrassed to see other people persecuted and dying of hunger. In life, it's more important to live with dignity than to be a great artist."

But Mr. Rubalcaba argues that he is not obliged to conform to the expectations or dogma of either Communist bureaucrats in Havana or their opponents. "I don't think I should play the part of a political functionary," he said. "I wouldn't even know how to dress, much less act, the part. I think the artist does to a certain extent represent the values of a society, but I am not a spokesman for any particular attitudes. The only way I know to speak is through my music."

If the Lincoln Center appearance goes well and Washington permits, Mr. Rubalcaba would like to tour and record in the United States. He would also like to work with American musicians ranging "from Pat Metheny to Al Foster," he says, in an effort to reanimate the traditional dialogue between jazz and Cuban music that began with his idol, Dizzy Gillespie. Can he also imagine living in the country where jazz was born? "I haven't ruled it out, but it's not my decision to make," he said with a cautious smile. "You'll have to ask the State Department about that." □

RECORDINGS VIEW

Making a Pitch To Rap's Hard Core

By AMY LINDEN

ABOUT FOUR YEARS AGO, L.L. Cool J. appeared to have lost favor with rap fans because his pop-savvy style seemed out of touch with hard-core hip-hop. But then came "Mama Said Knock You Out" in 1990. Produced by Marley Marl and Bob (Bobcat) Ervin with a tough, unflinching sound and with L.L. Cool J. rhyming as if his life depended on it, the album sold more than two million copies and made its author a staple of MTV. More important, it wooed back the faithful and reaffirmed the rapper's position as hip-hop's premier solo performer and chief love man.

So how does an artist follow up his biggest success? Cautiously. The 25-year-old rapper knows that you don't mess with a good thing and has reassembled the Marl-Ervin team. If his fifth and latest album, "14 Shots to the Dome" (Def Jam/Columbia 53325; CD and cassette), is not the breakthrough that its predecessor was, it is still a solid effort.

The title refers to the number of tracks on the recording (its release was supposedly delayed for months while the artist whittled down the 45 raps he had written). But there's another interpretation. "How I'm Coming," the album's first single, kicks off with the rapper barking, "Click-click boom, stop dead in your tracks/ Stick the steel in your mouth, buck, buck, buck, buck lights out." The even less subtle "Buckin 'Em Down" continues the gun imagery with references to hardware ranging from Tec-9's to Glocks and bananna clips.

The preoccupation with guns is new for L.L. Cool J., whose usual subject matter is girls, himself and girls. Granted, his targets on both tracks are crack dealers and other purveyors of destruction, but the gun-toting pose is the new album's most glaring misstep. By pandering to rap's lowest common denominator, L.L. Cool J., who has enjoyed pop success since his 1985 debut, "Radio," appears to be desperate for the approval of hip-hop's notoriously fickle hard core.

As befitting a rapper whose monicker stands for Ladies Love Cool James, he can lay the seduction on thick. One of the few hip-hop artists who can shift gears from the streets to the bedroom (or, in the case of the raunchy sex romp "Backseat," a jeep) with equal passion, he has a true romantic streak. If the flirtation with gangster violence is the rapper's nod to the fellows, the jubilant, bottom-heavy "Stand by Your Man" is his tribute, as he puts it, "to all the ladies in the house."

Set to a percolating groove, the rap is a pale echo of "Around the Way Girl," the rapper's love song to the girls in the 'hood that helped propel "Mama Said Knock You Out" to the top of the charts. With all its buoyant sexiness, "Stand by Your Man" typifies his approach to romance. Women are praised, appraised and conquered, but with respect and affection. Always the rogue and well aware of his appeal, he likes women. The overt sexism that permeates much of hip-hop is absent. His charm is exemplified by the sly closing of "Backseat," when he asks the girl for a hug, adding, "See what I'm saying, love?"

Amy Linden writes about pop music for People and Mirabella.

Larry Busacca/Retna

L. L. Cool J.—How does an artist follow up his biggest success? Cautiously.

L. L. Cool J. turns from boasting about girls (and himself) to gangsters and guns.

In between gunplay and foreplay there are paeans to hip-hop, and in particular the rapper's own legacy. Self-aggrandizement being an integral element of rap, if anyone has a right to brag, it's L. L. Cool J., who scored his first hit at age 16. The syncopated stutter of "A Little Something," which borrows liberally from King Floyd's 60's soul classic "Groove Me," is the rapper as b-boy peacock: sexy and confident. With music anchored by deep, taut beats, he boasts about his place in hip-hop on "Soul Survivor" and "Funkadelic Relic." Using his often imitated triple-time delivery, he spits out lyrics as if he were still fighting for respect.

But he isn't full blast all the time. On the loping "Pink Cookies in a Plastic Bag Getting Crushed by Buildings," his somewhat puzzling euphemism for making love, he whimsically strings together a rap by playing on the names of other hip-hop stars.

The album's biggest thematic shift comes in the last cut, "Crossroads." Though L. L. Cool J. is normally apolitical, he takes on crack, homelessness and child abuse with a seriousness usually reserved for an artistic statement. Augmented by celestial female choruses and faux classical string arrangements, the cut is reminiscent of the days when rock bands enlisted orchestras to legitimize their sound. With the most versatile style in hip-hop, and a graceful intelligence, L. L. Cool J. doesn't need such gimmicks. Yet "Crossroads" is the only song on the new album that takes the sort of risks that "Mama Said Knock You Out" did. With "14 Shots to the Dome," his insistence on playing it close to the vest undercuts his power. □

Why 'Cheers' Proved So Intoxicating

By BILL CARTER

LOS ANGELES

IT WAS JUST A VAGUE IDEA. TWO television writers who happened to be brothers had enjoyed success with "Taxi," a sitcom about a bunch of wisecracking cabdrivers in a Manhattan garage. The writers, Glen and Les Charles, collaborating with their most frequent director, James Burrows, thought they could devise another workplace comedy — perhaps in a more inviting locale.

That was 1981. A year later, the invitation was extended to viewers: Come visit a basement bar in Boston and listen to small talk and smart talk among an odd lot group of patrons. The bar, and the show, would be called "Cheers."

It flopped like a flounder.

"There were times when I thought we couldn't possibly survive," said Glen Charles. "But the reviews were great and the audience we did have seemed to love the show. So we figured at least it wouldn't be an embarrassment to put on our résumés."

The show was helped by NBC's desperate state in the early 1980's (a state the network has landed in again). With no shows high in the ratings, NBC thought it might as well hang onto the one show it had that was getting good ink. Then NBC found "The Cosby Show," and it brought hordes of viewers to Thursday nights. Many of them discovered "Cheers," and the series shot heavenward in the ratings.

The bar stayed open for 11 years on NBC, making the show the longest running comedy ever on that network, with thriving branch locations for its syndicated re-runs on stations around the country. It is shutting down now only because one of its stars, Ted Danson, called it quits. In the most recent weekly ratings, the show ranked ninth, the eighth straight year it finished among the top-10 programs in television. It was also the No. 1 show in the 1990-91 season.

The creators aimed for pure comedy that was sophisticated but not pretentious, 'I Love Lucy' as told by Noël Coward.

After winning 26 Emmy Awards and a record 111 nominations, "Cheers" will end its spectacular run on Thursday, May 20, and NBC has planned as grand a send-off as any for a television series. The network has scheduled a half-hour "Cheers" retrospective, then the 90-minute closing episode, and finally an entire "Tonight" show broadcast from the Bull and Finch, the Boston bar that was the model for Cheers.

The finale will not offer closure on the scale of the bar being swallowed up in an earthquake, but developments will affect the characters. The final seven minutes were filmed with only the cast and crew in attendance to keep the last scene secret.

The success of "Cheers" naturally translated into money, as all success in television does. But the show had several built-in advantages. Its audience was ideal for advertisers: mainly yuppies with disposable incomes. The show has taken in more than half a billion dollars in syndication revenues, making its creators rich enough to afford the best in cigars. At $450,000 per episode, Ted Danson became the highest-paid star in television.

NBC did rather well itself. "Cheers" has several times been the highest-priced show in television, with 30-second commercials going for as much as $300,000. Commercials in the final episode shattered the record for a television series, fetching a staggering $650,000 for 30 seconds, a figure usually associated only with Super Bowls.

All that cash did not change the look of the "Cheers" set, which stayed remarkably consistent. Nor did the emotion of the impending end of the series overwhelm the performers as they counted down to the close.

There was an uncharacteristically businesslike atmosphere on the set in early March, when the final episodes were being shot. No flowing of tears, no outbreaks of hugging. In backstage interviews, though, cast members confessed that while they were accustomed to closing shop each spring, the real impact was likely to kick in next August, with no new season of "Cheers" to return to.

The show will be missed all over the industry. Leslie Moonves, president of Lorimar Television and a fan, feels the way many Hollywood executives do about the series. He recalled sitting through a screening of a "major" comedy film that was about to be released, thinking, "The studio just spent $20 or $30 million on this, and there are more laughs in one episode of 'Cheers.' "

"Cheers" produced these laughs on a weekly basis, and on a budget — before it got inflated by star salaries, anyway — of less than $1 million a week.

"WE USED TO TRY TO find a movie to do when we went on hiatus," said Mr. Danson, sitting in his sunny office in the bungalow adjacent to the "Cheers" stage on the Paramount lot. "The comedy movie scripts never measured up. The best four episodes of 'Cheers' for any season were a much funnier two hours of comedy than any movie written that year. It was remarkable. The show became the gold standard for comedy writing."

"Cheers" is as much a throwback as a step forward. After "All in the Family" in the late 60's, it seemed almost obligatory for sitcoms to take up social causes, especially if they wanted to score Peabody Awards along with their Nielsens. "M*A*S*H*" was a vehicle for antiwar outrage; "Family Ties" poked fun at Reaganomics and the me-first ethic of the 80's, "Roseanne" takes the measure of class divisions. Every sitcom seemed to want to do "very special episodes" about drug abuse or illiteracy or someone's death and what it taught us about life.

On "Cheers," the lessons are incidental, and its subtext will have to be unearthed or imagined by the sociologists of the future. Rather, what the show's creators aimed to do was deliver pure comedy that was sophisticated but not pretentious, "I Love Lucy" as told by Noël Coward.

"We're not an issue show at all," Mr. Burrows said. "We write adult stuff." That stuff didn't, however, shrink from being more challenging than typical sitcom fare. "I remember the guy who did promotions for NBC coming to us and saying, 'I don't know how to promote a show that makes Schopenhauer jokes,' " Glen Charles said.

The progenitor with the closest family resemblance to "Cheers" is probably "The Mary Tyler Moore Show," whose characters always seemed much closer to their co-workers than to whomever it was they went home to. However much they snipe at one another — and they do — it's clear that the Cheers regulars would rather be in this pub than anywhere else.

The characters' very flaws are, in part, what makes them so irresistible: Sam, the lothario bar owner (described in the first episode as "a magnificent pagan beast" but hardly the smartest guy in town), played by Mr. Danson; Diane, the pretentious waitress (Shelley Long, who left the show after its fifth season but who will return for the final episode); Rebecca, the chronically insecure executive wanna-be (Kirstie Alley); Norm, the beer-guzzling, affable cynic who can

Shelley Long and Ted Danson in the final episode of "Cheers"—NBC will end the comedy's run with as grand a sendoff as any television series has received.

Might Have Beens

Here are some little known facts about "Cheers."

● The creators once did plan on marrying Sam off, but not to Diane or Rebecca. "It was just going to be somebody he met on the spur of the moment," said Les Charles, one of the show's three creators. "We had this whole profile laid out for the season with Sam being married. But the first show was a disaster. It never went on the air." Instead, in desperation, the writers in a matter of days threw together a story about Rebecca's sister coming to town and Sam trying to get each into bed. "We won an Emmy with that show," said Glen Charles, Les's brother and another of the show's creators. "It takes your breath away sometimes how the show was able to change week to week."

● John Ratzenberger, who plays the mail carrier Cliff Clavin, actually auditioned for the part of Norm (who at that point was called George) but failed to get it. "To save my dignity, I asked them if they had a bar know-it-all," Mr. Ratzenberger said. He did a character he had performed in a stage act, a guy who spouts useless facts with his fly open. He got a guest spot as Cliff and wound up as a regular.

● Robert Prosky, who later became the roll-call sergeant Stan Jablonski on "Hill Street Blues," originally agreed to play the Coach but dropped out at the last minute. "We thought we were dead," Glen Charles said. "Then someone suggested we look at a guy named Nicholas Colasanto. We saw him and he just was the Coach."

When Colasanto died in 1985, Woody Harrelson got the part that would replace him, of the farmboy Woody Boyd. "The character was named Woody before we ever saw Woody," said James Burrows, the show's director.

● At a final audition, three couples were paired as Sam and Diane to try out for NBC executives. They were Ted Danson and Shelley Long; the former football star Fred Dryer (who eventually starred in the show "Hunter") and Julia Duffy (later of "Newhart"), and William Devane ("Knots Landing") and Lisa Eichhorn (who starred in the film "Yanks").

"They were all funny," Mr. Burrows said. "Julia Duffy was really funny. And Fred really was the character of Sam. He was that strutting peacock." But the Danson-Long chemistry was instant and undeniable. "The NBC people saw it immediately," Mr. Burrows said. "Bang! It was there." — B. C.

Closing the Album On 'The Wonder Years'

EASY TO OVERLOOK, AMID ALL THE "CHEERS" FANfare, is the twilight of another distinctive comedy: ABC's "Wonder Years," which will present its final new episode Wednesday night at 8. In signing off, the series stays true to its original purpose — of taking an affectionate, sardonic look at growing up suburban in the late 1960's and early 70's.

The last episode finds the show's protagonist, Kevin Arnold (played by Fred Savage), now 17 years old, angrily quitting a summer job at his father's furniture factory and leaving town on what he imagines will be an odyssey of self-discovery. What happens is summed up by the show's narrator — Kevin himself, some years hence — thusly: "Things never turn out exactly the way you planned."

That narrator (Daniel Stern) has been the secret weapon of "The Wonder Years" since it went on the air to critical acclaim in January 1988. Kevin the elder is able to look over the shoulder of Kevin the confused adolescent and comment with gentle mockery on his delusions. While the show has always carried a light frosting of nostalgia, its central characters, the Arnold family and Kevin's friends, are remarkably unglamorized people — foolish, inarticulate, even mean-spirited on occasion — yet impossible not to like. As they fumble through life, misunderstanding and getting in the way of one another, the narrator provides the wry, rueful perspective they lack.

The final episode, written by Sy Rosen and the show's executive producer, Bob Brush, pronounces the fates of each character and resolves the durable but troubled romance of Kevin and the girl next door, Winnie Cooper. Mr. Brush said he was ready to "let go of 'The Wonder Years' " but added wistfully, "It would be wonderful to graduate Kevin from high school." PETER KAUFMAN them with plaintive strength. Once Mickey outgrows the obnoxiousness of childhood and the need to spit down the front of girls' dresses, Mr. O'Neill's performance proves increasingly powerful. The density of his emotions by the end almost threaten to crack open his brow.

'Shakespeare for My Father' Is a Gift From Lynn Redgrave

The others, however, are hobbled by roles that are not so much explorations as indictments of character. Ms. Walsh, above all. After having endearingly portrayed a befuddled mother in "Falsettos," the actress is now saddled with the unfortunate flip side. As wan Mrs. Lyons, afraid somehow that her adopted child will be taken away from her, she develops into a nervous wreck, then a crazed banshee wielding a kitchen knife.

The shoes on the dining-room table could have told us so. Or the magpie. Putting shoes on a table, apparently, is an open invitation to disaster. So is sighting a single magpie in the sky. Surprisingly, Margaret Thatcher is never blamed, although the recession, the bread lines and the upsurge of crime in the second act are at least partly her doing. (I should think that would make her the equivalent of a pair of pumps, at the least.) The narrator chooses the metaphorical explanation instead, announcing sonorously that "the dealer's dealt the cards and won't take them back."

Given the profusion of dire signs and signals, the fact that no black cat crosses the stage must be considered a simple oversight, not a mark of restraint.

'Shakespeare for My Father'

There's a double meaning in the title that the actress Lynn Redgrave has chosen for her compelling autobiographical one-woman show, "Shakespeare for My Father" (at the Helen Hayes Theater). Ms. Redgrave's father was Sir Michael Redgrave, a titan of the British stage, but a remote, uncaring presence at home, when he was at home, which wasn't a lot. Lynn was the third and last of his children (after Vanessa and Corin), and for a while she also seems to have been the glummest, shyest and least likely to succeed.

The actress possesses a bracing honesty, welcome wit and an unforced intelligence.

Sir Michael doesn't appear to have taken much note of her. He kept a journal for every year of his adult life, and while the entry for March 8, 1943, records the luncheon he enjoyed that day and various professional thoughts, it fails to mention Lynn's birth. That set a pattern of benign neglect (at best) and willful cruelty (at worst) that governed the relationship between father and daughter until his twilight years.

What Ms. Redgrave knew of her father she would glean from his illustrious performances, especially in such Shakespearean roles as Prospero, Antony, Hamlet, Richard II and Claudius. He was not Prospero, but there was Prospero in him; not Antony, but grand and imposing like Antony. The roles — and the volume of Shakespeare's complete works that he gave her as a Christmas present in 1953 — provided the clues that would allow her to track down the missing person. He was never going to be a part of her world, she remembers thinking while watching him one season at Stratford. She would have to join his. And so an actress was born.

In one respect, this beguiling memoir, beguilingly recounted, is a tribute to the patriarch who died of Parkinson's disease in 1985 believing the white curtains drawn round his hospital bed were theater curtains about to part. The Shakespearean scenes she performs in the course of the evening are for him — a gift. But the show's title can also be taken to mean that for much of her life she had Shakespeare in lieu of a father. So those Shakespearean scenes — Cordelia comforting the aged Lear, for example; Cleopatra extolling Antony; or Portia explaining mercy's qualities — are a way of probing her own past and her heart's confusion.

Naturally, the actress has her share of amusing backstage anecdotes to tell — we'd be disappointed if she didn't — and they're irresistible. Meeting Richard Burton in her dressing room, during the New York run of "My Fat Friend," she becomes a mass of blubbering adoration. Her recollections of rehearsals for "Hay Fever" at the National Theater afford her a delicious opportunity to do impressions of Noël Coward, Dame Edith Evans, and a young Maggie Smith contemplating a few scene-stealing ploys. But Ms. Redgrave is not just content to call up glittery memories, she's also searching for the hard truths about a family that expressed emotion more openly onstage than off.

Because the actress possesses a bracing honesty, welcome wit and an unforced intelligence, so does "Shakespeare for My Father." The suffocating egotism that can plague these one-person confessionals is refreshingly absent here. Ms. Redgrave paints such a large and colorful family portrait that, even though she is front and center for two hours, she never once appears to be hogging the spotlight. ☐ barely lift himself from the bar stool (George Wendt); Cliff, the blowhard mailman (John Ratzenberger); Carla, the abusive terror of a barmaid (Rhea Perlman); Woody, the sweet, naïve, dumbbell bartender (Woody Harrelson); Frasier, the intense, off-the-wall psychiatrist (Kelsey Grammer), and Lilith, his robotic, overbearing wife (Bebe Neuwirth). Mr. Harrelson replaced Nicholas Colasanto, who died in 1985 after three seasons as Coach, the avuncular but addlebrained barkeep.

If the aim was simple — to create laughs by bouncing these characters off one another — the method chosen was elaborate. An exchange of dialogue would be prepared so carefully that the viewer would end up laughing at both characters simultaneously. Or the funniest part of a joke might be not the punch line but the buildup, or a casual aside.

"If they had a big joke," said Brandon Tartikoff, the executive in charge of NBC Entertainment when the show began, "they'd keep going, adding on one more line, one more laugh."

An example: Diane returns from a blind date Sam has set up for her with a crazed motorcyclist, who, it turns out, has just done time — for murdering a waitress. She walks into the bar with her perfect little blond coiffure blown to pieces. That sight gag is the obvious big laugh. Then Diane, the soul of dainty precision, announces: "Excuse me. I have to go scrape the bugs off my teeth."

As might be expected in more than a decade of stories, "Cheers" took its characters through major life changes: Sam lost his bar and got it back; Norm lost his accounting job; Cliff confronted his dominating mother; Frasier experienced an intense marriage, fatherhood and finally abandonment.

But the show never pushed a character into a startlingly new direction. Over the years on "M*A*S*H," Hot Lips Houlihan evolved from sex-crazed harpy to feminist icon. Actors on "Cheers" never imposed their own personalities or heroic notions on their characters. Carla fired insults at her customers in year 11 just as she did in year 1. Sam never became a reformed womanizer. Norm didn't switch from beer to Snapple Iced Tea. As Mr. Wendt said of the show's creators, "They liked the fact that I showed no growth."

Glen and Les Charles retained their offices on the Paramount lot across from the "Cheers" set throughout the run of the series, but for the last several years the production load has fallen chiefly on Mr. Burrows's steady shoulders. Mr. Burrows, whose father was the veteran Broadway writer and director Abe Burrows, is described by the cast and production staff as indispensable, the person most responsible for the show's longevity. He directed more than 230 of the 275 episodes, and his leadership behind the scenes, they say, was equally essential to its success.

Just weeks before the last call for "Cheers," the Charles brothers, not noticeably older but noticeably more prosperous, sat in their dark but comfortably clubby offices alongside Mr. Burrows's and pondered what they had written and wrought.

"I think there's clearly a 'Cheers 1' and a 'Cheers 2,'" said Glen Charles. Part one was the Shelley Long era, when the romance between Sam and Diane Chambers became the hottest and funniest sexual relationship on television. During "Cheers 2" the show moved toward a more equitable mix involving all the characters, with Ms. Alley's Rebecca becoming Sam's friend rather than a target for his unquenchable lust.

"Maybe there was even a 'Cheers 2' and '3,'" said Les Charles. As he sees it, the last six years break down like this: three years of character comedy and three of "more screwball comedy." A recent episode about Woody's wedding, for example, had enough physical stunts to qualify as French bedroom farce.

Earlier this year, a 12th season of "Cheers" was in the planning stage. Paramount, the studio that produces the show, had already agreed to a deal with a very eager NBC for one more season. But Mr. Danson finally decided it was time to go. His rocky personal life — a marriage ended, talk of a relationship with Whoopi Goldberg — was all over the tabloids.

He spoke of his choice in philosophical terms that seemed to cover both the personal and professional changes he was facing. "This is a kind of regulated life," he said. "I need the lack of safety this show gives me. I need to be shook up a little bit."

There was talk of doing the show without its leading man, but that went nowhere. (A senior NBC executive pointed out that the original syndication deal for "Cheers" contained a unique provision: The stations that bought reruns were committed to buying any and all new episodes — but only as long as Mr. Danson was the star.)

The future of some "Cheers" cast members appears fairly clear. After "White Men Can't Jump" and "Indecent Proposal," Mr. Harrelson seems on his way to becoming a bankable movie star. The one "Cheers" spinoff, "Dr. Frasier Crane," will turn Mr. Grammer's character into a radio talk-show host in Seattle. (The original creative team will be only slightly involved.) Mr. Wendt will make a pilot for a new NBC series; Mr. Ratzenberger may be on the Fox network in the fall with "Locals," a show about eccentric folks in a small town.

Ms. Long's CBS series, "Good Advice," started rockily but still might return next season. Ms. Alley is making the second sequel to her most successful movie, "Look Who's Talking." Bebe Neuwirth is doing stage work. Rhea Perlman just wants to relax with her children and husband, Danny DeVito.

And Mr. Danson, who brought down the curtain? He stars in a movie, "Made in America," coming out this month. "I'm not sure if I'll do television again," he said. "But I don't really feel I've done television. I don't know what television is. I only know what 'Cheers' is." ☐

However much they snipe, it's clear the Cheers regulars would rather be in this bar than anywhere else.

The Freer Makes the Old New Once More

John Tsantes and Jeffrey Crespi/Freer Gallery of Art

The Freer Gallery in Washington, home to Whistler's famous Peacock Room and a vast trove of Asian art—One of the charms of the museum, which reopens today, is the palpable presence of its founder.

WASHINGTON

THE REOPENING TODAY OF THE Freer Gallery of Art, after four and a half years of top-to-bottom renovation, is cause for rejoicing. Not only is the Freer's great Asian collection back on view (300 of its finest objects) and reinstalled in a warmer, friendlier setting, but so is one of the most extravagant of 19th-century interiors, the Peacock Room designed by James McNeill Whistler — now cleaned, conserved and utterly dazzling.

Though the Freer stands in the shadows of Washington's other renowned museums and has a reputation for being a somewhat forbidding place, it has always had its ardent fans. Historically, it has the distinction of being the first American public collection devoted primarily to the art of Asia, though its holdings are what make it unique. "America Meets Asia," the working title for the reinstallation, says it all. Charles Lang Freer (1854-1919), the gallery's founder, collected both American and Asian art with equal fervor in the belief that all art springs from the same spiritual roots.

The growth of the Asian part of that collection — from 7,500 objects on Freer's death to 26,000-plus today — has made renovation long overdue. Of the $26 million in changes made to the building, the most radical will be invisible to the casual museumgoer. Two stories have been excavated directly beneath the building's central courtyard to create expanded conservation laboratories and to triple storage and study areas.

The first alterations that greet the visitor, however, are cosmetic and suggest the new sense of accessibility the gallery seems eager to project. They include a newly landscaped approach to the building from the Mall and a refurbished entrance foyer. The bulky modular wooden structure that once filled the lobby — a sort of Checkpoint Charlie affair dispensing postcards and information — is gone, opening up the airy vista of tall windows and the courtyard garden.

There are subtle adjustments within the galleries as well. The black terrazzo floors have been carpeted, and the walls, once a uniform gray-white accented by granite detailing, are painted in the mild decorator shades now favored by museums, such as soft blues and golds. The results are effective — a barely perceptible green glow, for example, settles around the rooms of Chinese bronzes — though surely some Freer habitués will miss the Spartan rigor of the former décor. They will also miss one of the museum's most memorable display features. The Japanese screens that used to stand unprotected on platforms in the center of a room now appear against the walls behind nonreflective glass.

Lighting has, at last, been brought up to date. The building was designed to use skylights as its source of illumination — fine for some work, unsatisfactory for others. Some superb Japanese wooden Buddhist figures were so hard to see in diffused natural light that they were rarely displayed. Now, enlivened by overhead spots, they look magnificent. At the same time, one can still feel the gallery suddenly dim and brighten as clouds

'A Sense of Touch, a Tenderness'

BY ROBERTA SMITH

Dorothy Norman never thought of herself as an artist. But at 88, she finds her photographs the subject of two retrospectives.

THE LARGE, SLIGHTLY ALmond-shaped eyes of Dorothy Norman, so arresting in Alfred Stieglitz's portraits of her, are startlingly unchanged: They stare at a visitor with an open, friendly luminosity, as if she expects you to be marvelous and so you will. Even though her beautifully cropped hair is silver and her speech (but not her thinking) slowed somewhat by a stroke, the face is a smooth, Modigliani oval, the jaw clean and strong. Age and illness seem to have taken her back in time: at 88 she looks more like the young woman of Stieglitz's photographs than she did at 70, when Arnold Newman took her picture.

Stieglitz photographed Mrs. Norman repeatedly in the two decades before his death in 1946. They had met in 1926, in his small but influential domain, the Intimate Gallery on Park Avenue, where she was entranced by a John Marin exhibition. Although both were married and neither was interested in divorce, they gradually fell in love.

Mrs. Norman had been an amateur photographer since childhood, and under Stieglitz's tutelage she took up the medium with a new seriousness. Her condensed, carefully composed portraits and close-up views of flowers and buildings indicate an unusual sensitivity to the nuances of light while also suggesting that she learned much from her mentor. Rarely exhibited, these photographs are the subject of two exhibitions: a retrospective of nearly 90 works at the International Center for Photography on Fifth Avenue (through June 27) and a smaller selection at the 292 Gallery in SoHo (through Saturday).

At the time they met, Stieglitz was 62, the preeminent dealer-priest of the burgeoning American art scene and the husband of the painter Georgia O'Keeffe, who was spending increasing amounts of time in the Southwest. She was the 21-year-old-wife of Edward Norman, son of one of the founders of Sears, Roebuck & Company (he died in 1955) and possessed of an unflagging devotion to culture and political causes. Born in a wealthy German-Jewish family in Philadelphia in 1905, Mrs. Norman had studied art at the Barnes Foundation, but on settling in New York her social conscience took precedent over her interest in art.

She threw herself into volunteer work with the American Civil Liberties Union, the Urban League and Margaret Sanger's fledgling Planned Parenthood, until her doctor ordered her to slow down due to the impending birth of her first child. She began going to the art galleries in New York — and remembers being disappointed by every one until she came to "the Room," as regulars called the Intimate Gallery.

While Mrs. Norman got a lot from Stieglitz, she, in turn, probably extended both his life and his work. In 1932, with her encouragement and with money she raised from family and friends, he opened his final gallery, An American Place, which remained the center of his activities until his death. Not only did Mrs. Norman raise money to keep the gallery going, she oversaw most of its workings, arriving every day after lunch. She also made many photographs of Stieglitz and his world. These images of his face, his hands and the gallery where each wall was a different shade of white are probably the most extensive portraits of him that exists.

To visit Mrs. Norman these days in her town house on the Upper East Side of Manhattan is to enter a highly personal archive of lived experience. Although confined largely to a wheelchair, she continues to work and has nearly finished two books. One, "The Great Round," examines the use and meaning of the circle in art and architecture; the other, "Dorothy Norman: Memories and Mediations," is a sequel to "Encounters," her first memoir.

The house itself is something one wants to pour over inch by inch: a former brownstone that the architect William Lescaze converted into an International Style gem for the Normans in the early 1940's. Its second floor is minimally divided, full of books, art and artifacts and comfortable sofas in rich colors, as if a stylish yet unpretentious study had been executed on a salon scale. The second floor still looks like what it once was, a place where artists, writers, politicians and the like loved to come and talk and move beyond the limit of their own lives and interests.

Mrs. Norman said that she had to stop taking photographs in the late 1950's "because my eyes wouldn't let me," adding that she never thought of herself as an artist or did she ask people to pose for her. "I never asked them to do anything. Sometimes I might say, 'Sit down.' "

She only photographed people she cared about, but it turns out that her friends added up to a fascinatingly varied roster of important figures from the 30's, 40's and 50's: not only Stieglitz and such members of his circle as Marin, Charles Demuth and Waldo Frank, but also Theodore Dreiser, Lewis Mumford, Richard Wright, Harold Clurman and John

Josef Koudelka's Melancholy Visions Of Gypsy Life

Josef Koudelka/Pace-MacGill Gallery

A 1963 Koudelka photograph of a handcuffed young Gypsy under arrest for the murder of his wife—Emotionally harrowing.

IT WAS THE MUSIC, PLAINTIVE AND dark, that in 1962 led Josef Koudelka to begin photographing the Gypsies of his native Czechoslovakia. "I was playing Gypsy music myself," he explained recently. Then a 24-year-old aeronautical engineer in Prague, Mr. Koudelka eventually became a photojournalist in exile, famous for enigmatic and evocative images of cultures on the margins of industrial society. "I just began to photograph them. And once I started I couldn't stop."

Mr. Koudelka's pictures of Gypsies, most of them made during the 60's, brought him worldwide attention. They are at the heart of a 42-print retrospective at the Pace-MacGill Gallery on East 57th Street through June 12, along with examples of his work as a theater photographer in Prague. Also on view are the riveting photographs he made in 1968 of the invasion of Czechoslovakia by Warsaw Pact troops, two years before he fled to the West, first to London, then to Paris, where he now lives.

But it is the Gypsy pictures that most clearly define Mr. Koudelka's darkly romantic view of the world. Replete with narrative suggestions, they belong to the rich photographic tradition pioneered by André Kertész, Henri Cartier-Bresson and Robert Frank. In one image, a Gypsy crouches beside a white horse, as if talking to it, while the horse nods in apparent understanding. In another, the body of a woman is seen laid out in a coffin inside a cramped cottage, with her family and fellow villagers crowded around; the body and the faces of the mourners are etched with dingy sunlight from the room's only window.

Mr. Koudelka's stark images depict the poverty and clannishness of Gypsy life, but unlike many documentary photographers, he does not present their situation as a social problem that can somehow be fixed. Instead, he shows the Gypsies as perpetual outsiders, and their life as a primal mix of glee and wonder, sorrow and mystery.

"If a picture is good, it tells many different stories," Mr. Koudelka said in an interview at the gallery. One of his best-known images, taken in 1963, has plot lines enough for a Hollywood story conference: a young Gypsy, under arrest for murdering his wife, is shown in handcuffs, isolated in the foreground, his face a stunned mask and his shoulders hunched into himself; he seems to be in a different world from that of the villagers and policemen in the distance.

Some critics have written that the man was being led off to his execution, but Mr. Koudelka reports that he was only sent to prison for his crime. The man himself insisted that his wife had died from an accidental fall. Whatever the truth, today the man is proud to have been the subject of this emotionally harrowing photograph. This year, on a trip to Prague, where he has taken a small apartment, Mr. Koudelka looked up the man, who is now out of prison. When he showed him his picture, the man called his friends around: "Look! That's me!"

Taking the photographs of Gypsies was fraught with difficulties. Mr. Koudelka, now 55, had to take time off from his job to visit the Gypsy camps and villages. Not only were his subjects mistrustful, but the Communist Government was less than thrilled. Officials were suspicious of his efforts to record the life of these outcasts, who are looked at askance by many Eastern Europeans.

Josef Koudelka/Magnum

A 1989 self-portrait of the artist.

The Gypsy photographs first brought Mr. Koudelka attention in the West, but it was his images of the August 1968 invasion of Czechoslovakia that cemented his reputation as an important documentary photographer. When Soviet-led tanks rolled into Prague, Mr. Koudelka was in the thick of the action, photographing mass demonstrations and the confrontations between protesters and invading soldiers. Among the moments Mr. Koudelka recorded are one of a man draped in a Czechoslovak flag falling on his knees in front of a tank, and of a woman sobbing as she clutches the edge of a bloody flag.

Smuggled out of Czechoslovakia soon after the invasion, the stunning black-and-white images were widely published in the West. With no film or video records made of the events, Mr. Koudelka's blurry, intense photographs provided powerful evidence of the brutality of the crackdown. But because Mr. Koudelka was still in Czechoslovakia and subject to reprisals, the pictures were published with the credit line "P. P." — Prague photographer. In 1969 the Overseas Press Club in Europe awarded him the Robert Capa Gold Medal anonymously for his graphic account of the terrible events.

His stark images show lives that mixed glee and wonder, sorrow and mystery.

These chapters in Mr. Koudelka's life and work are well represented at Pace-MacGill, as are his lesser-known theater photographs, made during the same period as the Gypsy pictures. Working with two theater groups in Prague — one of which, Theater on the Balustrade, had Vaclav Havel as dramaturge — Mr. Koudelka developed a distinctive and charged style of recording productions, focusing on intensely emotional moments between characters, seen in close-up and printed in high contrast.

After Mr. Koudelka fled to the West in 1970, he joined Magnum, the photojournalists' cooperative, and began to record popular religious festivals and Gypsy life throughout Western Europe.

But his reputation as a loner and an unconventional photographer grew apace. For 17 years he refused to take magazine assignments, preferring to live on an astonishing succession of grants and prizes from arts agencies in France, Britain and the United States. "I was never paid for anything in Czechoslovakia," he said, "so it was easy to accept not being paid in the West. Also, I was used to a lower living standard."

He has followed his own stylistic path as well. While he still uses the 35-millimeter cameras that are standard equipment for photojournalists today, many of the pictures he has taken over the past seven years have been made with panoramic cameras. Using the elongated format of these cameras, he has photographed what he describes as "things about to be lost, to be finished," including heavy industry in northern France, the destruction of the Berlin wall and bombed-out buildings in Beirut.

The present show does not include any of Mr. Koudelka's recent work, but stops in 1968, with his pictures of the crushing of the Prague Spring. He is now working on various book projects, including a collection of his panoramic photographs, and continues to travel widely, photographing as he goes. Like many great photojournalists, he has become himself an outsider, a Gypsy. □ pass overhead.

The Freer Shines Once More

The use of natural light was Charles Freer's own idea — he was convinced it created the only proper ambiance for viewing art — and there is no question that his personality still marks every aspect of the museum. Freer was a complex man, so modest that he only reluctantly put his name on the institution he founded and so controlling that at his insistence no object from the collection could ever be displayed outside the building, lest his meticulously chosen selection be disturbed.

Born in Kingston, N.Y., in 1854, he had no more than a seventh-grade education, but he made a fortune early, moving from paymaster in a small private transport company to major player in the vast railway ventures centered in Detroit. He never married, but like other rich men of the Gilded Age trying to soften the aggressive face of industry, he found fulfillment in collecting art.

He began cautiously, buying European prints, then paintings by such now obscure Americans as Abbot Handerson Thayer, Dwight William Tryon and Thomas Wilmer Dewing, to each of whom a full room is devoted in the museum. When Freer encountered the work of Whistler — the provocative American expatriate artist — he became hooked, acquiring vast numbers of works during the artist's lifetime and the Peacock Room after his death. Freer adopted Whistler's romantic esthetic as his own, and Freer's intense belief in a transcendent, universalist concept of beauty impelled him to join Eastern and Western objects together under one roof.

Of Freer's American painters, Whistler is, of course, the one great star, and he is seen to memorable advantage in his "Harmony in Blue and Gold: The Peacock Room," the only complete interior he ever created. The room had a peculiar history. In 1876 Whistler was asked by a patron, the Liverpool merchant F. R. Leyland, for advice on the colors for the dining room of his London house, a room that held a Whistler painting. It was a simple enough request; the walls were already covered with expensive gilded leather, and a fringed Oriental carpet was in place.

Whistler, self-adoring and obsessive, seemed primarily concerned that the room complement his centerpiece painting, an exercise in Japanism titled "The Princess of the Country of Porcelain." With Leyland out of town, he completely transformed the space. He cut off the carpet fringe, covered the floor-to-ceiling spindle shelving with gilt, painted the leather walls in verdigris green and Prussian blue and the window shutters with images of immense golden peacocks.

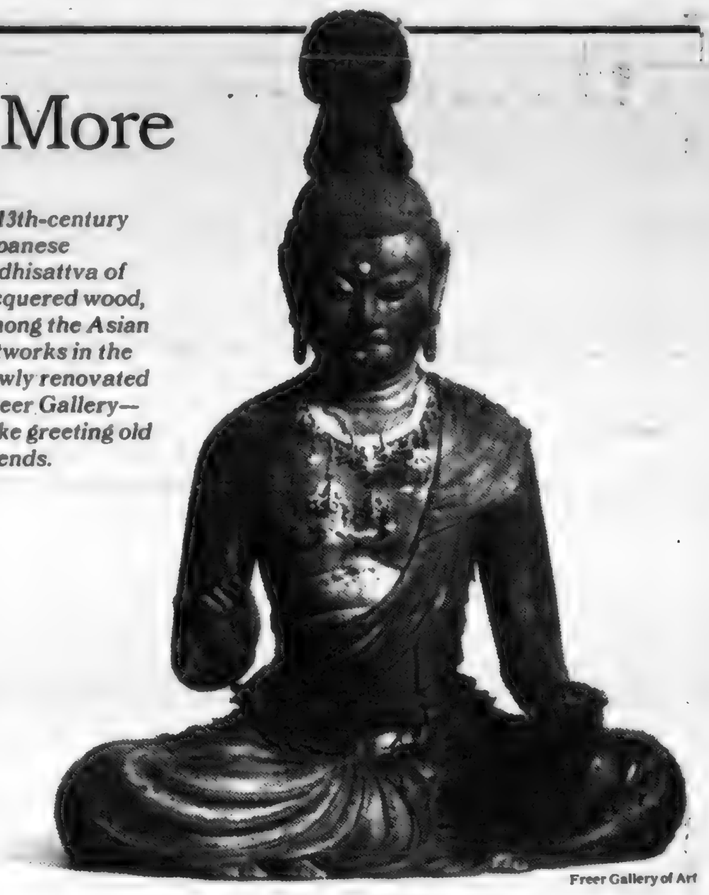
Leyland hated the results. When he grudgingly paid Whistler for his work in pounds rather than guineas — a professional insult — the artist added two final peacocks, one meant as an elegant self-portrait, the other as an image of his combative, strutting patron. Freer, in his turn, loved the room; he brought it intact from England and kept it installed in his Detroit home for years. Maybe its almost preposterous glamour appealed to an otherwise hidden side of Freer's sober, punctilious character.

TODAY MORE THAN EVER one can see why it did. Every inch of the room has been cleaned to reveal not only Whistler's complicated and still mysterious technique but also color gradations as ethereal as those found in the dusky, near-abstract landscape paintings he called "Nocturnes." And for the first time at the Freer, the shelves have been filled with the kind of blue-and-white Chinese porcelain the room originally held, adding yet another layer of ornament to its eccentric ensemble.

While Freer shared Whistler's Orientalist tastes — in a sense, the very existence of the Freer Gallery might be attributed to them — one senses that he took Asian art more seriously than Whistler ever did. In 1894 Freer traveled to Asia for the first time, to Ceylon (now Sri Lanka), then to India, and finally to Japan, the first of five such trips. After a year of tireless looking, and buying, he returned to America. Four years later, at age 45, he retired from business for good to devote his life to collecting.

With time, Freer's interest turned increasingly to Chinese art. His eye was not unerring. Some of the paintings he bought as Sung-period works were actually Ming. (The Freer is planning to announce a major show of its Ming paintings.) But his expertise grew keener, and his choices were often on target, not only in East Asian art but in the Islamic work from India and Syria and in the Christian work from Egypt that he also acquired.

In 1906 Freer offered his collection, along with an endowment and money for a building, to the Smithsonian with two conditions: that the collection never be expanded (a requirement he later revoked, at least as it applied to Asian work) and that none of the work be lent. It never has been.



Freer Gallery of Art

A 13th-century Japanese bodhisattva of lacquered wood, among the Asian artworks in the newly renovated Freer Gallery—Like greeting old friends.

Despite the undeniable if freakish allure of the Peacock Room, it is, of course, Asian art that makes the Freer a matchless experience. The reinstallation has been lovingly accomplished by the director, Milo Beach, and eight curators. For anyone familiar with the collection, walking through the reorganized galleries is like greeting old friends who have been away and meeting a few splendid new ones brought into the fold.

From the opening Islamic gallery, featuring a fabulous 10th-century Iranian bowl bordered with Arabic script, one moves to the small but stunning South Asian collection, with its famous 10th-century bronze Indian image now thought to be of the princess Sembiyan Mahadevi. The transition to East Asian cultures is made in a third gallery, devoted to Buddhist art. Two important Indian narrative friezes are followed by the eighth-century Tang stone bodhisattva that Freer bought in 1909 and an ornate 18th-century Chinese cloisonné shrine acquired only two years ago and on view for the first time.

The Chinese galleries are spectacular, with neolithic jades, ceremonial bronzes and porcelains succeeding one another. Among the paintings are some of the Freer's greatest treasures. "The Nymph of the Lo River," a 12th- or 13th-century Sung copy of a fourth-century original, shows the Chinese landscape tradition in its infancy; in the 12th-century "Wind and Snow in the Fir-Pines" by Li Shan, the promise of that tradition is brilliantly fulfilled.

The Freer's Japanese materials are equally renowned. In addition to screens (Sotatsu's famous "Waves at Matsushima" is on view), the installation offers a 12th-century painting of the poet Saigu no Nyogo, her voluminous robes folded over her like the pages of a giant book. Also on view is a hand scroll of a poem written on paper and decorated with an exquisite pattern of flying cranes stamped in black and gold.

At the end of the Japanese galleries, one is suddenly with Whistler again, in a room that holds some of the Freer's vast collection of the artist's work. (The Freer will mount a Whistler show to coincide with one planned by the National Gallery in 1995.) This meeting of cultures is certainly one concrete justification for the Freer's "America Meets Asia" theme. But there is another. Ultimately, one of the charms and puzzles of this museum remains the palpable presence of Freer himself — a reticent, small-town American, very much a product of his time, who had the imagination to spend his adult life pursuing beauty in lands he had only dreamed of as a child. Thanks to the recent refurbishing of his vision, that dream still shines bright today. □

Where El Dorado Has Become a Golden Reality

By RITA REIF

THE DAZZLING GOLD OBJECTS assembled in the newly designed Jan Mitchell Treasury at the Metropolitan Museum of Art make up what Philippe de Montebello, the museum's director, calls "our little El Dorado."

Dramatically expanded to exhibit 250 funerary masks, beakers, pectorals and ear ornaments, the gallery surveys all the pre-Columbian gold-working areas. While each of the nations — Mexico, Panama, Costa Rica, Ecuador, Colombia and Peru — owns larger and more impressive holdings of its own early metalwork, the Metropolitan's collection of gold of the ancient Americas is the most representative in the world.

The main additions are from Jan Mitchell, the New York businessman who financed the rebuilding of the gallery, which opened this month, and donated more than 70 of the works on display. Mr. Mitchell's holdings, acquired over more than 30 years, have been merged with earlier acquisitions from the 1979 bequest of Nelson A. Rockefeller and with gifts that had been donated in the 1960's and 1970's by Alice K. Bache, widow of the investment banker Harold L. Bache.

The Metropolitan's enlarged gallery of pre-Columbian gold doesn't only dazzle. It coaxes a smile.

At the entrance to the gallery, a spectacular array of pieces from what is now Colombia hints at why Spanish conquistadors were inspired to feats of horror and heroism seeking the treasures of the El Dorado legend. That story tells of a lord who appeared sprinkled with gold dust and adorned with gold jewelry to pray to the sun on his raft in the center of a lake. When he finished, he and his chieftains threw their gold into the lake.

In the museum's darkened setting, the metal works glow brightly and seductively under pinpoint spots. The first display case contains items made between the first and seventh centuries near the Calima River in Colombia; they are among the plainest and most imitated of all pre-Columbian gold. Ear ornaments the size of Frisbees are unadorned disks with hammered surfaces ranging in hue from yellow to red. Masks with broad cheeks, large eyes and gaping mouths could be smiling or screaming.

Another case has more elaborate works from the same region, made shortly before the Spanish conquest in the 16th century. On these pieces, which possess remarkable vigor, serpents, birds and masked figures are depicted in great numbers. Among the masterpieces made by the Tairona people, the gold workers of the Santa Clara Mountains, is a prize from Mr. Mitchell's collection: a masked figure, five inches tall, with a bat's head, a diamond-shaped nose and a headdress of birds and sweeping scrolls.

The most common pre-Columbian images are of eagles — birds of prey "probably worn as protective emblems," said Julie Jones, the Metropolitan curator in charge of the Michael C. Rockefeller Wing, where the gallery is situated. "The meanings of bats and crocodiles are even less clearly understood. But obviously these creatures were regarded with respect."

The earliest pre-Columbian gold, made about 1500 B.C., was discovered in the 1970's in Peru, between Lima and Cuzco. The objects discovered were tiny bits of gold foil, placed in the hands and mouth of a young man in a tomb. Casting and more complex metalworking techniques were developed later. And the practice of interring gold with the dead continued for 3,000 years.

The museum's Peruvian material is the most varied and sophisticated of all pre-Columbian metalwork. For example, on a nose ornament, gold threads were woven into the finest mesh to depict a spider's web, complete with four tiny spiders. Bolder images of bird-men dancing appear on ear flares of hammered gold and turquoise. Peruvian beakers carry images of men's faces or frogs, done in relief, some upside down. The beakers, which were found in tombs, are thought to have been made for sipping corn beer at funerals or in the afterlife.

To Mr. Mitchell, the greatest attraction of this gold is the humor of so many of the pieces. "No other ancient culture seems so cheerful," he explained "The faces within faces on a Calima headdress seem to be laughing and making fun, and the masked Tairona figure stands like a weightlifter wearing a headdress that seems bigger than he is. It's most amusing."

Mr. Mitchell, the former restaurateur who owned Luchow's and the Longchamps chain, said his interest in gold began when he was a child. "When I was 5 and had learned how to read," he recalled, "my father gave me a gold coin."

Born in Sweden, raised in Finland and educated in Switzerland, Mr. Mitchell became a serious collector after he arrived in New York in 1950. After amassing holdings in Greek, Roman and Etruscan gold, he discovered pre-Columbian art in the late 50's. Now in his 70's, he still collects today.

Part of what he and many others admire about pre-Columbian gold is the exquisite world of strange creatures documented on these ornaments. That world ended 50 years after Columbus discovered America, lost, paradoxically, in part because the lust for gold fueled so much destruction. □

"At long last the authentic rock musical that has eluded Broadway for two generations. Not merely an entertainment juggernaut, riding at full tilt on its visual and musical highs . . . but a surprisingly moving resusitation of the disturbing passions that made [its source] an emblem of its era." (Rich) St. James, 246 W. 44th St. (239-6200) (2:00) (A related article is on page 1.)

ANOTHER TIME — A drama by Ronald Harwood about a Jewish family living in South Africa. Directed by Stanley Brechner. With Malcolm McDowell, Marian Seldes, Joan Copeland, Michael Lombard and James Waterston. The play is written with "theatricality and humor." Although the production "has its dramatic shortcomings, the actors are accomplished instrumentalists. They perform the play as if it were chamber music." (Gussow) American Jewish Theater, 307 W. 26th St. (633-9797) (2 hours 15 minutes) Closes today.

A COUPLE OF BLAGUARDS — Comedy skits, written, directed and performed by Frank and Malachy McCourt, about their lives in Ireland and America. (Not reviewed at press time.) Irish Arts Center, 553 W. 51st St. (757-3318) (2:00) Closes May 23.

FORBIDDEN BROADWAY 1993 — A satirical musical, written and directed by Gerard Alessandrini. The pleasures "are intermittent," but "even when a specific skit would benefit from urbane redevelopment, there are comic compensations." (Gussow) Theater East, 211 E. 60th St. (838-9090) (1:45)

HELLO MUDDAH, HELLO FADDUH — A comedy by Douglas Bernstein and Rob Krausz, featuring the musical parodies of Allan Sherman. Directed by Michael Leeds. With James Hindman, Susan Cella, Allan Heinberg, Leslie Klein and Scott Robertson. "The show is a triumph of casting and staging over material that often feels quite musty." (Holden) Circle in the Square Downtown, 159 Bleecker St. (254-6330) (2:00)

JEFFREY — A comedy by Paul Rudnick about a gay man living in New York who decides to be celibate. Directed by Christopher Ashley. John Michael Higgins stars. OLEANNA — A drama, written and directed by David Mamet, about a middle-aged professor, a young woman student and a case of sexual harassment. An expository first act leads to a "wholly absorbing" second act "likely to provoke more arguments than any play this year." PUTTING IT TOGETHER — A collection of Stephen Sondheim's songs, directed by Julia McKenzie. With Julie Andrews, Stephen Collins, Christopher Durang, Michael Rupert and Rachel York. THREE HOTELS — A drama by Jon Robin Baitz about a chameleonlike man and his wife who discover the spiritual cost of a rise to power. Directed by Joe Mantello. With Christine Lahti and Ron Rifkin. Though not among the gifted Mr. Baitz's most satisfying plays, it can be enjoyed "for the high luster of its sharper lines." The "riveting" performances of Mr. Rifkin and Ms. Lahti "in themselves make the evening an occasion." (Rich) Circle Repertory, 99 Seventh Ave. S., at W. Fourth St. (924-7100) (1:15)

The photographs in both shows are small, with the faces usually filling the picture. They have a tantalizing sense of concentration and intimacy, as if they were taken midway in a friendly conversation and mark a connection centered on mutual interests beyond the making of the portrait. Mumford, Dreiser and Wright, for example, contributed to Twice a Year, the journal of art and politics that Mrs. Norman edited and published between 1938 and 1948. She got to know Clurman when he persuaded her to become one of the original supporters of the Group Theater around 1930.

Her active support of India's independence led to friendships with both Nehru and his daughter and to other publishing projects: In the 1960's she edited a two-volume book of Nehru's writings, and in 1987 a book of the letters that Mrs. Gandhi wrote her, titled "Indira Gandhi: Letters to an American Friend." Her other books include "Alfred Stieglitz: An American Seer," the first full-length biography of the photographer, which was published in 1973.

Just as Mrs. Norman tended to make portraits of those she knew well, most of the art on view in her house is by people she was close to. Photographs by Stieglitz are in breathtaking abundance, alternating with her images of him. There are paintings and watercolors by Marin, Morris Graves and Saul Steinberg.

But she makes it abundantly clear that friendship isn't the basis of her esthetic judgment. When asked whether she liked Cage's music, she replied emphatically, "I liked him." Asked about the work of Jackson Pollock, whom she got to know in the 1950's when she began summering in East Hampton, she said: "I didn't love Pollock's work. That's why I couldn't live with it. But he was a good artist. It seems so pretentious to say I didn't love something and therefore it isn't great art. That isn't what I mean."

Suzanne DeChillo/The New York Times

Dorothy Norman at 88—A face like a Modigliani oval.

In a period when political art is so prominent, it is illuminating to encounter Mrs. Norman's combination of fervent estheticism and activism, and the ways she has both mixed them together and yet kept them separate. The two strains probably came closest together in Twice a Year, in which one might encounter writings by Richard Wright on racial discrimination in America beside E. E. Cummings on the sculpture of Gaston Lachaise, or the anti-Nazi photomontages of John Heartfield followed by one of Stieglitz's photographs of drifting clouds from his well-known "Equivalent" series.

Yet both sides of her busy life seemed to be fueled by a profound faith in the individual. Asked what it is that attracts her to a work of art, her answer sums up both her photographs and her social concerns: "A sense of touch, a tenderness or something, an identity with a person." □

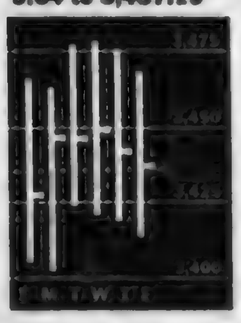
Going Long: Bond Buyers Are Sanguine

THERE is no better indication of the confidence of a society in its industrial and financial system than its willingness to buy truly long-term bonds. It takes a lot of trust to lend money for 30 years or more on fixed terms. You have to believe the issuer will be around, and capable of repaying, for all that time, and you have to believe that the currency in question will retain its value.

By that standard, American confidence is growing, but it is not even close to the level it once reached. Both Texaco and Boeing have sold 50-year bonds this year, hitting a maturity that had not been seen for decades. The companies are betting that the current level of long-term interest rates is a bargain for issuers; buyers are hoping the reverse is true. Texaco hedged its bet by reserving the right to buy back the bonds in 20 years, but there is no such provision in the Boeing issue.

The Dow Rises 9.64 to 3,437.19



The peak in long-term confidence came more than a century ago, when some railroads were able to issue 999-year bonds. One such bond, issued by a company since acquired by the Canadian Pacific, is still paying 4 percent interest and is supposed to continue doing so until 2883.

The assumption that the rails would be around, and able to repay, for 10 centuries seems amazing now, but no more than the assumption that the currency would not depreciate. (Those bonds were usually denominated in gold, but governments effectively erased that protection during the Depression.)

Today, investors seem sanguine about risks. Jessica Palmer, the co-head of capital markets at Salomon Brothers, which underwrote the 50-year bonds, says that investors demanded only a tenth of a percentage point or less in extra yield to compensate them for the risk of going out 50 years rather than 30.

Rates Are Down But Still High . . .

That spread seems a bit low, notwithstanding the fact that the buyers of the Boeing issue have profited as prices rose in the past month. After all, a lot can happen — to a company and a currency — in half a century. In 1943, Boeing had yet to build its first jet, and a dollar could buy 10 copies of The Sunday New York Times. The top ticket for the Broadway hit "Oklahoma" was $2.75 and long-term interest rates were under 3 percent. It proved to be a great time to issue long-term bonds, and a bad time to buy them.

While corporations now are eager to issue more long-term bonds, the Government has decided to cut back by selling fewer 30-year issues and more securities that mature in less than three years. If rates keep falling, that will be a wise move for the Government.

. . . And Treasury Maturities Are Up

Unfortunately for the taxpayers, the Government's record as a bond-market timer is poor. It was just after World War II that it began to rely more on short-term borrowing, thus reducing the average maturity of Government debt. During the 1980's, the Government raised the amount it was borrowing on a long-term basis. In neither case was the decision a wise one, at least in terms of minimizing the Government's total interest payments.

Don't Joke About This Stock Market

Nicholas D. Kristof/The New York Times

Once a Red Guard, now a millionaire, Millions Yang advises investors lining up in Shanghai.

In China, today's great leap forward is being made by investors like Millions Yang.

By NICHOLAS D. KRISTOF

SHANGHAI

IN his private trading room at a local securities firm, Millions Yang peers intently at a parade of price charts flowing across a computer screen. Mr. Yang, a rotund former Red Guard who earned his nickname the easy way, by making millions in the stock market, breaks into a smile.

"Today I made 100,000 yuan," almost $20,000, he says, laughing. "Not bad for a day."

Outside Mr. Yang's office during one recent lunch break, several hundred small investors line up, eager to place orders when trading resumes two hours later. Millions Yang goes to the door and they ask him for advice.

"Millions Yang!" call dozens of voices. "Millions Yang, what should I buy?" one man shouts. "Give me some tips," yells another. Millions Yang — which translates to Yang Baiwan in Chinese — chats with those in front of the line. Heads crane as those in back try to overhear.

"I'm trapped in a loss," one woman tells him despairingly. "What should I do?"

"You must be willing to take a loss," he answers, and people nod, taking mental notes. "If it's going down, sell it and accept the loss. Otherwise you'll be stuck with a bigger loss."

That's the way it is at the Chinese stock market these days. The market used to be just a curiosity, a sort of masquerade in which Communists cross-dressed as capitalists and waved share certificates in place of little red books. American financiers and journalists dropped by the stock exchanges to chat patronizingly with the traders: "So, Mr. Yang, how much money did you make today? A dollar! That's wonderful — you're going to be a rich man."

2 Million Shareholders

No one is patronizing these days. Now China has two million shareholders, with the number growing by about 50,000 a week. The market index in Shanghai soared 167 percent last year, and these days even the small American investor can buy into the Chinese market, although some experts suggest it might be just as prudent to visit Las Vegas.

On a good day, the two-year-old Chinese market trades $350 million worth of shares, more than Hong Kong in a slow session. And it is growing at a prodigious rate: in the first quarter of 1993, the Shanghai Stock Exchange enjoyed a trading volume 2.2 times that of all of 1992. With the number of listings expected almost to double this year, some experts think that in a year or two the Shanghai market will regularly enjoy the highest volume in Asia outside Japan.

In short, the Chinese stock market is transforming itself from a curiosity to a major force. The metamorphosis is quite a spectacle. Thousands of Chinese companies yearn to go public, at home or on foreign exchanges. Hundreds of foreign accountants and lawyers are struggling to make sense of nonsensical Chinese balance sheets. Western investment banks are opening offices in China and paying huge sums for anyone who knows how to say "P/E ratio" in Chinese. Above all, tens of millions of ordinary Chinese are desperate to become shareholders. Last August, a million Chinese lined up for days under a fierce sun to buy stock — more precisely, to pay several weeks' salary for an application form that would give them a 10 percent chance of being allowed to buy new shares. When the forms ran out, the would-be investors rioted. Securities executives in the West could be pardoned for feeling a bit envious.

The growth of the stock market is having an important effect on China as a whole. First, state-owned companies, perennially inefficient, begin to care about profitability. "You can see that when the companies issue stocks, they have to have a board of directors, they have to be

Keeping Tabs on Clients Who Rip Off Their Brokers
From its warren of shopworn offices near Wall Street, the Compliance Data Center acts as a clearinghouse for dirt on investors who stiff their brokers. McKay White, the company's feisty 62-year-old senior vice president, reigns over the four-person team that operates as a command center for brokerage houses who are sizing up the ethics of prospective clients. With so many retail accounts being opened these days, keeping track of the bad guys is a growth business. By Susan Antilla.

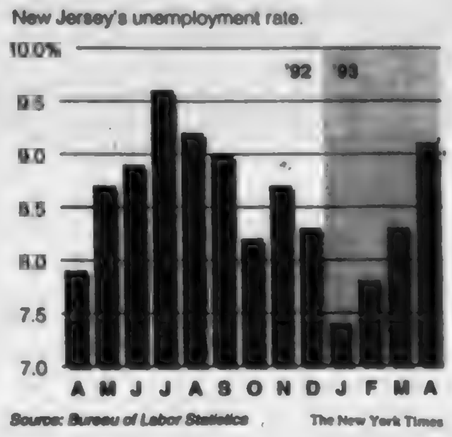
THE ECONOMY

Job Growth Stalls, but New Jersey Screeches Into Reverse

The week's top story? That depends. If you have a job, it's probably Bosnia; if you don't, it's probably unemployment. That story changed little last week — except, say, in New Jersey. April's national jobless rate stalled at 7 percent, with businesses adding just 119,000 new jobs. But in New Jersey, the rate soared to 9.1 percent, from 8.3 in March and 7.4 as recently as January. That's the highest rate of the 11 most populous states. Even elsewhere, though, job growth is nothing to cheer about: gains have merely kept pace with population growth. Total jobs still fall more than a million short of the pre-recession peak of 119 million. So where does this leave the Administration, as the Bush economy slowly becomes the Clinton economy? Some see bad news and said the pressure was on to create jobs. But Laura Tyson, the top Administration economist, called the report "neutral to positive."



A Payroll Tax to Pay the Doctor?

It's simple to rebuild a health care system: just decide who foots the bill. The Clinton team could be close to that crucial decision. Administration officials said last week that employers could be asked to pay up to 7 percent of payrolls, with the premiums going to regional groups to buy coverage in bulk. This would smooth out some bumps in the price of health care, lowering costs for old-line industries heavy with retirees, while getting more from smaller companies. Of course, no matter how the plan works out, strong opposition is expected. In a pre-emptive strike at critics, President Clinton asked the nation "not to let the special interests spook and scare" Congress from "our manifest duty."

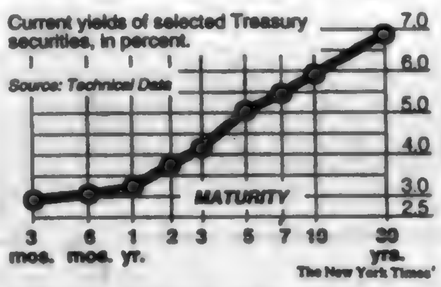
He won't ask that it be done just yet, though. Letting the deficit talk have center stage for now, the Administration will not send the health plan to Congress till June.

U.S. Joins the Rush to Refinance



Borrowers nationwide are cashing in on low interest rates — often by refinancing a mortgage. So naturally the biggest borrower of all — the Federal Government — wants to get in on the action. When the Treasury borrows money for 30 years, it pays a lot more interest than for just a few years. So last week it slashed sales of 30-year bonds nearly in half and said it would sell more two- and three-year notes. Treasury Secretary Lloyd Bentsen said the move would "produce real savings" and "is in the best interests of American taxpayers." But critics called it a gamble that short-term rates would stay low — and said it was a bad bet. "It will cost the taxpayer money over time," one economist said.

Lobbyists' Gifts, Unwrapped

Most Americans often want to tell senators a thing or two, and about 10,000 of them do it for a living — they're called lobbyists. A free dinner here, tickets to a baseball game there — all legal, all secret, all to get a senator's ear. This practice has angered many people, and last week, against all odds, a reformer had his day. Citing what he saw as "systemic corruption," Paul Wellstone, a first-term Minnesota Democrat with a mission, proposed forcing lobbyists to report any gift worth more than $20. Comfortable habits die hard, so his colleagues resisted fiercely — but when the showdown came, they followed like lambs. Seeing the drawbacks of open opposition to such an apple-pie issue, senators ducked, debated only briefly and passed the proposal quickly.

Putting Housing Bias to a Test

Study after study has shown it: Bias — racial and otherwise — is widespread in mortgage lending. One way to try to root it out is to send Federal agents to pose as borrowers and see how they're treated. Those who call for tough enforcement of fair-housing laws have long sought such testers, but bankers — who stand to be embarrassed, or worse — insist they're unreliable. Last week the Clinton Administration, to the cheers of consumer groups, decided to try testers. "It's very exciting," said Deepak Bhargava of the lobbying group Acorn. "It is a real, marked departure from the previous Administration's posture."

Open. Cook. Cook Some More.

Ground beef clearly needs no instruction book. Think again. Three recent deaths and many illnesses from tainted meat got the Agriculture Department's attention, and last week it said all raw meat and poultry must have cooking instructions. The next battle: what the labels will say. They could be warnings, plunging drumsticks into a class with cigarettes (which have no healthy uses), or instructions. "These will not be warning labels," insisted the American Meat Institute, but "care labels." But one consumer advocate called it the "dumbest thing I ever heard of" not to say why the label's there. Warning or no, one hopes a hamburger will be easier to operate than a VCR.

INTERNATIONAL

What Price Human Rights?

President Clinton wants better human rights in China. Can he afford it? He must decide soon whether to extend most-favored-nation trading status — campaigning, he'd said that would hinge on human rights. But as he's learning regularly, compromise is inevitable, and everything has a price. The price here: China buys an awful lot of stuff in this country — jets, cars, oil-drilling gear — and these purchases create 150,000 domestic jobs. The Chinese have raised the ante recently, going on a $1 billion spending spree, to make it as costly as possible for Mr. Clinton to cut them off.

While many companies are eager to trade with China, others balk. Levi Strauss said it was ending most business in China, citing "pervasive violation of human rights."

East Germans Present I.O.U.'s

For Germany, the cost of unity rises relentlessly. Workers in the east get about half what those in the west earn, and the Government promised to reduce that gap. But now employers say that with the nation's deepening woes, they just can't afford it. So last week thousands of steelworkers and metalworkers went on strike in the east, demanding what was promised. "This is not just about money," one strike leader said. "People here have simply had enough of the broken promises and lies that have followed unity."

Chrysler Pro to I.B.M.'s Rescue

The help-wanted ad was daunting: Take the financial reins of a corporate giant lurching from crisis to crisis and persuade a highly skeptical Wall Street that you know which end is up. Experience should include performing this impossible task at another leviathan on the brink. Where else to turn but Chrysler, the decade's comeback kid? And that's just what I.B.M. did last week, plucking away Jerome B. York, who helped put the auto maker on its $3 billion diet, to be its chief financial officer. Taking on I.B.M.'s troubles, Mr. York said — understating the case in the extreme — will be "one of the most challenging business situations in the 90's."

He Put Wine on America's Table

Ernest & Julio Gallo. It's a brand name that has become part of the language, but last week the words took on a very human face when Julio, 83, was killed in a Jeep accident on a family ranch. The winery was born when Prohibition ended, in 1933. And the business the brothers built — Julio was the president, Ernest the chairman — was staggering in its success: this family makes one of every four glasses of wine this country pours.

Boesky Asks for Pocket Money

Black Star/Cumins

Only the $100 million is still together.

He'd done his time, his wife had split, and he needed a bit of her money to tide him over. What sum did Ivan Boesky have in mind? Oh, $20,000 a week ought to do it. Failing that, it was the flophouse for sure. (Such numbers were not unheard of in the courtroom: Ivana Trump and her husband had severed their ties within the same walls.) But last week Mr. Boesky started to talk real money. His wife, Seema, is worth — in terrifyingly round numbers — $100 million, and he was in court demanding half. Never mind where the money came from. What did Mrs. Boesky have to say? "My husband was a rat."

Donald Trump, Underdog

Ray Fisk for The New York Times

Atlantic City is circling its wagons.

Donald Trump is now a victim of discrimination — or so he seems to say in a Federal lawsuit. A 1988 law has enabled Indian tribes in various states to open casinos, and Mr. Trump and his Atlantic City colleagues are not at all happy about the competition. Now, some unhappy people see therapists, some go to court; Mr. Trump went to court. His suit contends that the 1988 law gives an advantage to "a very limited class of citizens" (Indians) at the expense of others (Mr. Trump, for instance). Mr. Trump may have been moved to act because the issue could soon be on his doorstep: New Jersey's Ramapough Indians are edging toward a gambling pact. And that tribe's reaction to Mr. Trump? Says a Ramapough lawyer: "This guy is unbelievable."

New Blow for Empire Blue Cross

Troubles keep piling up for Empire Blue Cross and Blue Shield. It lost $250 million on its insurance business in 1991 and 1992. Its reserves are dangerously low. Congress is looking into possible management problems across the Blue Cross organization. And last week the Government said its handling of $1.7 billion in Medicare claims was "abysmal" and that its contract might be canceled, which would mean a $63 million loss. For its part, Empire pinned part of the blame on a new computer system and said much of its processing had improved.

Downtown's Empty Feeling

Downtowns Bleak Across the Nation

Jack Manning/The New York Times

Rising behind New Street office towers, 14 Wall Street is an older downtown building that is undergoing renovation.

By JEANNE B. PINDER

IT was once a proud building, as the gilded mosaic over one entrance testifies: An angel grasping a lightning bolt, symbol of technology's mastery over that era, adorns 67 Broad Street, built to house ITT's headquarters in 1928. But now, the 33-story lower Manhattan building is three-fourths empty, the mosaic entrance is unused, and the building was foreclosed upon in January.

Across the way, at 80 Broad Street, a whimsical quartet of metal seahorses hovers over the entrance of the stately 36-story building, which is 51 percent vacant.

This stretch of Broad Street, at the heart of New York's financial district, is eerily serene. The overbuilding of the 1980's, coupled with the city's economic problems and a wave of relocations to newer and better-equipped buildings in midtown, has left downtown's older buildings simply desperate. It is a tale echoed in many parts of lower Manhattan, as in downtown areas across the country.

In New York, the vast swaths of empty office space pose a stark problem for the owners of older buildings, as well as for city officials. Even as the economy recovers, the downtown vacancy rate has continued to rise, and no one is sure when — or whether — job growth will resume, increasing demand for offices.

The optimists speak of renovations that will make the buildings desirable again, or of converting the buildings into apartments or hotels. Others say that many can never be saved, and will have to be demolished. Such decisions, it seems clear, will be based not only on job growth, but on whether owners — with or without public aid — can invest enough to help bring a turnaround.

"It would really be a crime to lose them," said Laurie Beckelman, chairwoman of the city's Landmarks Preservation Commission. "A number of them are architecturally significant, and they also tell the history of the development of the city, of New York as a skyscraper town. These canyons of stone shouldn't just be left to be rubble."

THE problems for the city are financial as well as esthetic.

"The City of New York stands to lose as much as half a billion dollars a year in tax collections if the decline in values continues unabated in lower Manhattan," said John H. Alschuler Jr. of Hamilton, Rabinovitz & Alschuler, a policy and management consulting firm. He said that figure represents about one-sixteenth of the city's property tax income. "The government needs to intervene constructively in order to preserve the property tax base that supports vital services needed by city residents."

For many owners, the problem is complicated by the fact that the vacancy rate is so high in the older buildings that money cannot be found for extensive renovations. This, in turn, affects their ability to rent space.

In the part of Manhattan roughly south of Chambers Street and the Brooklyn Bridge, the "secondary" or less desirable buildings — a group that includes unrenovated older structures — were 26.4 percent vacant as of March 31, according to Cushman & Wakefield, a real estate brokerage and management company. In the middle stretch of Broad Street, a corridor anchored at one end by the New York Stock Exchange and at the other by the relatively new headquarters of Goldman, Sachs, the rate could be as high as 45 percent, the brokerage Edward S. Gordon estimates.

While the New York City figures are among the worst in the nation, other cities also face an overhang of empty space in older, less desirable buildings. In Dallas, secondary buildings are 39.1 percent vacant, according to Cushman & Wakefield, and in Philadelphia, the figure is 24.7 percent.

Along Broad Street, owners have not given up, despite long odds and huge costs.

For example, at 67 Broad, the Principal Financial Group of Des Moines, Iowa, has taken over the 544,000-square-foot structure and is studying what to do. "We'd like to fix it up a little bit and lease it up," said Steve Franzenburg, a director of the investment department at Principal Financial.

Deciding what to do is not easy. Many of these buildings need upgrades in their power capacity to accommodate computer wiring; the changes may require raised floors or dropped ceilings that make the work space unacceptably tight. Some need asbestos removal, air-conditioning work and upgrades or replacements for their lobbies and poky, shabby elevators. Also, there are potential problems in complying with the Americans With Disabilities Act, which requires easy access to entrances and lavatories.

Many of these problems can be fixed with enough money, but some cannot. Larger prospective tenants look for open space, with no columns or existing offices, and floor sizes of between 25,000 and 40,000 square feet, which is unusual in older buildings. They also want floors in regular rectangles or squares — shapes that cannot be found in older buildings where the layout may be triangular (because of downtown's irregular streets) or H-shaped (to help air circulation in the days before air conditioning).

"The lobby you can modernize, the air conditioning you can modernize, the electrical system you can modernize — but you can't change the size and shape of the building," said Raymond T. O'Keefe, head of the downtown office of the Edward S. Gordon brokerage.

A make-over is a tough job. A year ago, Galbreath Riverbank, a Manhattan real estate company, started work for GE Investments in renovating 14 Wall Street, a 960,000-square-foot, 37-story, pyramid-topped tower built in 1912 by Bankers Trust and expanded in 1932. Bankers Trust is still a major tenant in the building, which is 80 percent leased.

John V. Wheeler, who is in charge of the renovation for Galbreath Riverbank, said the work on the vacant space and common areas of the building, which is around the corner from the troubled stretch of Broad Street, would cost about $15.6 million. The project is to be completed later this year.

The plan includes a new roof, sidewalks, elevator mechanical systems, energy-efficient windows and repairs to the mortarwork. In the category of esthetics, the building is getting new elevator cars, remodeled corridors on multitenant floors, improvements to newly leased spaces and renovations in its lobby and entrance, which include replacing the two revolving doors with one flanked by wider swing doors that comply with the access requirements of the Americans With Disabilities Act.

The building's management has already added a hotel-style concierge station in the lobby and restored the soaring, gilt-trimmed bank office that is paneled in French cherry veneer. It is also refurbishing the restaurant at the base of the pyramid.

"The competition is so fierce, and there are so many options out there, that you have to be at your absolute best to attract new tenants," Mr. Wheeler said.

DESPITE the work to be done at 14 Wall Street, the building has advantages over other older structures. It has an ample power supply, and its ceilings are unusually high. It also has architectural distinction, easily seen in its airy and august lobby. And it has an owner with deep pockets as well as a steady income stream from tenants.

Not all owners are so well positioned, and the New York City Planning Department is coordinating a new study that will seek solutions for their problems.

One option is to convert older buildings to residential housing. Another often-mentioned solution is demolition for those buildings that cannot be used for other purposes, with the lots then left vacant for parks until the space is needed for a new building.

While even some preservationists agree that not all of the buildings can be saved, the practical side of demolition poses problems. It is expensive and difficult to take down a building in lower Manhattan's tight and winding streets. Also, the city's zoning laws, enacted after many downtown buildings were constructed, restrict the size of new buildings that could replace them.

Despite the gloom over the empty office space, the downtown area has history on its side in bouncing back from adversity. One notable comeback occurred in 1958, when warnings about its death led David Rockefeller to form the Downtown-Lower Manhattan Association to examine the area's future. "Then he built Chase Manhattan Plaza, which was an immediate, very loud statement that downtown was indeed not dead," recalled Barbara L. Christen, president of the association.

Now the group is looking to the conclusions of the city study, expected in June.

"The theory is that every time lower Manhattan goes into the doldrums, there's a major development that pulls it out," said Mr. O'Keefe, the Edward S. Gordon downtown manager, as the bells of Trinity Church pealed the hour next door to his Broadway office.

"It's where this nation was founded, and it's where George Washington was first sworn in," he added, reeling off a list of downtown's attractions — the South Street Seaport, the summertime opportunity to rent a sailboat, a winter breakfast at Fraunces Tavern and the fact that downtown is consistently cooler in the summer than midtown because it is surrounded by water. "It's just a nice place. And someone's going to figure that out again." ■

Visions of 24-Hour Neighborhoods

HOW to avert the death of downtown Manhattan? That is the question the New York City Planning Department is trying to answer in conjunction with the city's Economic Development Corporation and the Downtown-Lower Manhattan Association.

In their study of downtown's future, the groups are looking at the erosion of the area's employment base but are also examining potential new uses for old office buildings. One possibility is to convert some empty buildings to residential housing. The study estimates that about 45 buildings containing 4.2 million square feet of space are likely candidates for residential use.

Shirin Karanfiloglu, manager of the study, said about 110 buildings, most of them small structures in the southern Tribeca and South Street Seaport areas, have already been converted to residences. Only three buildings that are 15 stories or taller have been converted, she said.

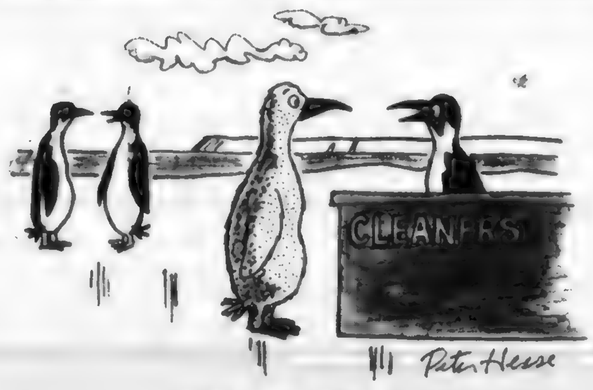
Among the obstacles to conversion are the size and shape of the buildings, as well as zoning regulations. Further, the area is lacking in grocery stores, dry cleaners and other businesses that support neighborhood life.

"A major goal of our study is turning lower Manhattan into a 24-hour environment," Ms. Karanfiloglu said.

Another possibility for invigorating downtown is a plan to build a big new building to combine the American and New York Stock Exchanges. Early discussions have reportedly put a price tag of $1 billion on a 50-story tower including two 55,000-square-foot trading floors. The new building would clearly make some older structures even less competitive, but its supporters hope it would have a positive overall effect on the area's future.

Barbara L. Christen, president of the Downtown-Lower Manhattan Association, predicted that a variety of solutions would ultimately be found: a mix of traditional office space, residential conversions and space for innovative uses ranging from educational centers to computer software design laboratories.

"And then, when nothing fits, that's when you may have to take a building down and make a park, then bank it until such time as you have the money and the need to build a new building," she said.



"It'll be ready Tuesday."

audited, and they pay a lot more attention to efficiency," said Pan Muping, the Shanghai representative of Crosby Securities, a Hong Kong-based brokerage that was one of the first to be bullish on China.

More broadly, the rise of the market legitimizes the kind of quasi-capitalism that has been around for a dozen years but is steadily becoming less quasi and more capitalism.

Also, it helps create the kind of urban middle class that is the foundation for a modern civil society. In the past, the Communist Party was the sole source of power and prestige. While the party remains awesomely powerful, it is no longer the only show in town. Business interests are becoming an alternative power base, an alternative source of values, a rival source of prestige.

A Westerner Impressed

The changes impress William A. Schreyer, chairman of Merrill Lynch & Company, who was in China last month to open the firm's new office here in Shanghai. "The modernization of China's economy, I think, is one of the most exciting endeavors in this century," he said, "and we want to be there and be part of it."

Mr. Schreyer said he was impressed from the moment he took the road from the Beijing airport and saw what seemed a continuous construction zone. He grew more enthusiastic when Prime Minister Li Peng and Communist Party General Secretary Jiang Zemin both received him and expressed interest in improving corporate accounting standards.

"If I were 25 years younger," the 65-year-old Mr. Schreyer said, "I'd study Chinese and ask Merrill Lynch to post me there."

He added that Merrill Lynch is positioning itself in China in the hope of growing with the local market just as it did in Japan 32 years ago.

What? Mention the Japanese and Chinese stock markets in the same breath? A couple of years ago that would have been regarded as foolish. Now it's regarded as visionary.

"China is the world's fastest-growing economy," said Duncan P. F. Mount, managing director of CEF Investment Management Ltd. in Hong Kong. "There are about 300,000 incorporated companies, of which about 70 are listed. In time, it's obviously going to be Asia's biggest stock market, probably bigger than Japan. The question is how long it's going to take, not is it going to happen."

Some Caveats

To be sure, the same could have been said back in 1914, when Shanghai first opened a securities exchange. Fund managers and brokers who promoted Shanghai back then may eventually be proven to be visionaries, but from beneath their gravestones their clients will be unimpressed.

Even now, the Chinese market faces enormous challenges that Westerners do not always appreciate. Like the rest of the economy, the stock system is laced with corruption that alienates many ordinary citizens. Most of the trading is a speculative froth that bears little relationship to fundamentals, and some of the excitement seems to be of the flavor-of-the-month variety. At various times, other emerging markets — South Korea, Indonesia, Taiwan, Mexico, etc. — have been the toast of international investors, but often the small investor showed up as the party ended, just in time to pay the bill.

What is more, most of the Chinese companies that list stocks are from the state-owned sector, which is the weakest part of the economy. The companies that are behind the Chinese boom are the small township factories and private enterprises that operate on a small scale, bribe local officials, dodge taxes and keep miserable accounts. It is virtually impossible for foreigners to buy shares in them.

This may well be the make-or-break year for the Chinese stock market, which is still formally dubbed an experiment. If all goes smoothly, China's leaders are expected to decide next year that the experiment is over, and that they can implement the shareholding system on a far wider scale.

The stock market in its current form began in December 1990 with the formal opening of the Shanghai Securities Exchange. About the same time, the southern city of Shenzhen, next to Hong Kong, was also allowed to open an exchange.

Nicholas D. Kristof/The New York Times

No trading by car phone here. Investors in Shanghai bicycle to a securities firm to buy and sell, often spending the day.

These days the Shanghai exchange trades in 62 stocks, with several more to be listed over the next month. The exchange now has 600 seats; in June that will rise to 2,500. The Government has agreed in principle that 50 or 60 more companies from all over the country can list this year, issuing shares with a par value of $1 billion.

"Late this year or early next year, we'll regularly have higher trading volumes than Hong Kong," said Wei Wenyuan, the executive director of the Shanghai exchange. "Then it'll keep going up from there."

The Shanghai exchange has gradually left the Shenzhen exchange behind and become the premier market in the country. A half-dozen other cities are desperately trying to start their own stock exchanges, but the Government has refused to allow them to do so.

Many Chinese buy stocks with the giddy excitement they might show in entering a casino. Investors have heard about a few people who committed suicide after losing their money, but mostly they hear stories about folks like Millions Yang. The losers keep quiet. So the emphasis is on speculative in-and-out trading. Chinese speak of "chao gu," or stir-frying stocks, meaning to turn them over quickly.

Chinese do not telephone their brokers; instead they swarm into the brokerages. Each of the dozens of brokerages in Shanghai has a huge trading room in which individual investors stand shoulder to shoulder, watching a huge screen with share prices. To trade, they fill out a form and stand in a long line, sometimes for hours, to give it to a broker.

In Shanghai alone, more than 100,000 people have become professional investors. Some have quit their jobs; others — in what local people say with a wink is a demonstration of the superiority of socialism — simply don't show up at work while still being paid. They spend every day in the trading rooms of a brokerage.

The "da hu" — big rollers, those with more than $90,000 in their accounts — get favored treatment. At Shenyin Securities, for example, a da hu is allowed to pay $40 a month and get a pass to enter a basement room with sofas and computer monitors. A purchase order can be handed to a broker without waiting in line.

"A year ago we had 15 da hu here," said Zhu Weidong, a 22-year-old broker who looks after them. "Now we have 60." Mr. Zhu said the richest of them once had the equivalent of almost $2 million in his account.

The securities boom has created a shortage of employees in the field. Companies lure brokers by paying $200 a month, several times the prevailing wage, and offering bonuses.

For now, of course, the stock markets are essentially local ones in just two of China's innumerable cities. But this year they are supposed to go national. The Shenzhen exchange just listed a company from Hainan Province, and one or two major companies from each of China's 30 provinces are supposed to go public in Shanghai or Shenzhen in the coming months.

At the same time, the Shanghai exchange is eagerly targeting investors in other cities. Fifty cities, in every province but Tibet, are now hooked up to the Shanghai stock computer system. On April 26, the exchange began to broadcast share information by satellite to a network of receiving stations all over the country, and two-way trading by satellite is scheduled to begin in November.

The transformation of the Shanghai market into a national one would be hugely important. It would multiply the pool of potential investors by a hundred, and allow more long-term investors to join the speculators.

Little Regulation

Still, the market faces a host of problems. One of the most important is that there is little regulatory control. A new Securities Regulatory Commission has been established, but nobody seems inclined to pay it much heed.

"The foundation for China's stock market is seriously inadequate, creating equally serious problems," a confidential Government report declared recently. The 18-page report, classified secret, strongly supported the continued development of the market but warned of far-reaching corruption, inter-ministry rivalries and other problems. In particular, the report warned against "power shares" — gifts of stock to Government figures to win favors.

"We're approached by companies every day, banging on our door and saying that they want to go public," said Gao Xiqing, an American-trained lawyer who is chief counsel to the Securities Regulatory Commission. "It's remarkable how the whole country is so gung ho." Perhaps too gung ho. Because the Government is restricting the numbers that can go public, there is a natural temptation to offer bribes.

"Some people come in and offer us X number of shares in their company," said Mr. Gao, who is in charge of public offerings. "They don't have the concept of a conflict of interest. I say I can't take it, and they think I don't have the money. So they say it's free. And then when they understand that I just can't accept it, they say it doesn't have to be in my name."

Millions Yang acknowledges that there are problems in the stock market, but he thinks they will be easily overcome. Shanghai, he says, will eventually become the financial capital of the Far East.

Asked whether hard-liners might close the stock market after Deng Xiaoping dies, Mr. Yang paused for only a second. "I don't worry," he said, then offered a novel interpretation of Marxism: "The goal of the revolution was to make people rich, and now they're rich. The Government won't allow folks to become poor again." ■

Various Ways to Get In on the China Play

Aside from rushing to Shanghai and "stir-frying" shares alongside Millions Yang, foreigners can participate in the Chinese stock market in several ways.

One of the simplest is to buy into one of the 30-odd China funds, with $1.3 billion in assets, offered by international securities firms. Some of these funds are traded, like shares, on the New York Stock Exchange and other exchanges, or are available directly through brokers.

The problem with that is that some of the funds are not what their names might imply. Some hold mostly cash rather than China stocks, or their "China holdings" may be almost entirely companies in Hong Kong that do business in China. The recent fascination with "China concept" stocks has led many Hong Kong companies to put China in their names so that they can enjoy the premium afforded to China plays.

Another possibility is to invest in Chinese companies listed abroad. One such company, Brilliance China Automotive Holdings, was listed on the New York Stock Exchange last year, and others hope to follow. In addition, nine Chinese companies are expected to list on the Hong Kong Stock Exchange later this year. The best known is Qingdao Brewery, which makes Tsingtao Beer.

The final possibility is to invest directly in Chinese shares. While foreigners are not allowed to buy ordinary shares in Chinese companies, 10 companies in Shanghai and 9 in Shenzhen have listed a special kind of foreign currency-denominated stock — called B-shares — that only foreigners may purchase. Some large brokerages can arrange a purchase of the B-shares.

However, transaction costs in B-shares are relatively high, trading volume is low and the B-shares change hands at less than half the price of the A-shares held by Chinese investors.

One reason in the past for the limited demand was that the clearing system in Shanghai did not meet standards of the United States Securities and Exchange Commission, effectively keeping out many American investors. But the Shanghai exchange has started a new settlement system, and last month the S.E.C. agreed to allow China funds to buy B-shares.

Buying by American fund managers may give the B-shares a boost, but they would get an even bigger boost if Chinese nationals were allowed to use their United States dollars to buy them. China's central bank and foreign exchange agency have so far blocked proposals to allow Chinese to buy B-shares.

Red Guards To Hot Profits

Before Millions Yang became an investment legend, he was active as a Red Guard during the Cultural Revolution from 1966 to 1976. Those were chaotic years in Shanghai. Vehicles were instructed to go forward at a red light and stop at a green light — the Red Guards reasoning that red, as the revolutionary color, should not be associated with coming to a halt. Not all drivers got the message, however, and accidents were common. Finally traffic lights were given special dispensation to pursue their bourgeois ways. A red light again meant to stop.

After the Cultural Revolution, Mr. Yang, whose real name is Yang Huailding, found that making money was more fun than making revolution. He entered the securities business in 1988, buying Government bonds in rural areas and selling them in Shanghai. This was a lucrative business, and partly as a result it was suspect. While there was no clear law against it, the authorities periodically denounced such arbitrage with the ugliest of words in the official vocabulary: speculation.

When the stock market opened, Mr. Yang began reading about equities, quickly developed a knack for trading and became the nation's most famous investor. In China, he says, it is still pretty easy to make a quick profit. "In New York, the market is more mature so it's harder to get a profit," he said. "Here everything is still being developed, so it's a lot easier."

Do Apple's Compromises Make Business Sense?

The price is right, but features that businesses need are missing.

APPLE COMPUTER INC. has introduced a family of powerful Macs under the name Centris, trying to close the gap between its Macintosh computers and the more popular and cheaper Windows-based personal computers.

Compared with previous Macintoshes, the Centris models 610 and 650 offer impressive power at surprisingly low prices. But the lower prices were achieved in part by jettisoning features that are important for many business uses, especially in the case of the 610.

Both Centris models are built around versions of Motorola's 68040 microprocessor, which is roughly equivalent to the Intel Corporation's i486 chip used in the newest Windows computers. Apple has previously offered the 68040 chip only in its Quadra family of Macintoshes, and Quadras are very expensive. With powerful Intel-based PC's widely available for less than $2,500, not many executives have been able to justify spending twice that amount for a Quadra.

"All of a sudden there's a way to get into the 68040 without spending $5,000," said Bob LeVitus, a writer who conducts seminars for businesses on how to take best advantage of the Macintosh. "With the '040, you get more horsepower and better performance. There has always been a premium on Apple hardware, and thankfully the premium gap has shrunk a lot. It means many people can now afford to have the real thing, Windows being the fake thing."

Apple, whose Macs have no direct competitors, has been generally perceived to be years ahead of its DOS-Windows counterparts in terms of software, but years behind in hardware.

It scored a stunning upset in portable computers with its Powerbook notebook models, now the best-selling portables of any type. But Apple still lags on the desktop, where Windows users have hundreds of different choices of i486-based hardware from dozens of companies.

And Apple's software advantage is in peril because of recent advances in the Microsoft Corporation's DOS-Windows operating system and the imminent arrival of such Macintosh alternatives as Nextstep for Intel.

"Apple has to convince the market that they are in fact competitive with the Windows platform," said Marc C. Litvinoff, an analyst with the Gartner Group of Stamford, Conn. "They do compete well on a price perspective, and they have better networking capabilities, but the Windows platform is catching up."

With the Centrises, the question is whether Apple can persuade its loyal customers to embrace the 68040 as quickly as Intel was able to win the hearts of business computer buyers with the i486.

Computer Intelligence, a market research company in La Jolla, Calif., estimates that the i486 went from 2 percent of all business PC purchases in 1991 to 25 percent in 1992 and an estimated 60 percent in 1993.

The entry-level Centris 610 has a base price of $1,859, 4 megabytes of system memory, an 80-megabyte hard disk drive and 512 kilobytes of a special memory called video RAM that increases the quality of images shown on screen. The price does not include a monitor or a keyboard; although those from recent Macs will work fine.

When equipped as a potent business machine, with more system memory, a bigger hard disk, a monitor, a keyboard, a mouse, a network adapter and other add-ons, the Centris 610 price will probably be closer to $3,500 — still a lower premium for Macintosh technology than before, but well ahead of what one would pay for a comparably equipped Intel i486SX computer.

And the Centris 610 has two serious drawbacks as a mainstream business tool. One is its limited expansion ability; it has but a single internal expansion slot, and the slot is incompatible with most of the expansion cards already used in Macintosh computers. What is more, it accepts only 7-inch cards, which are rare thus far. To add injury to insult, that single slot cannot be used without a special adapter that sells for $99.

Expansion slots are important to people who want to add Ethernet network adapters, big-screen monitors or other common features. With a single slot, a user must choose one function and forgo the others. In larger offices, where a computer may be used by many different people over its life span, the lack of slots is a decided drawback.

The other major drawback is the lack of a math co-processor, which is standard on Windows computers with the i486DX microprocessor. A co-processor is useful for activities that require lots of calculations, like working with big spreadsheets or manipulating graphics. The Centris 610 can certainly do those chores, but it would do them a lot faster with a co-processor. Apple has made it possible to add a co-processor, but the cost is more than $500.

On the other hand, people who have limited foreseeable need for system expansion will find the Centris 610 a nimble performer, at least twice as fast as the Mac IIci. It comes in a pizza-box design that is just thick enough to allow an internal CD-ROM drive. And slots are less important on the Macintosh than they are on Windows PC's. Many peripherals that require an internal card on a Windows machine are simply plug-in devices for the Mac. Finally, the Centris 610's 68LC040 chip still crunches through Excel spreadsheets faster than 68030-based Macs, even without a co-processor.

The Centris 650 is a better choice for businesses, at least for those willing to pay extra for more slots. It is a bigger computer, virtually identical in appearance to the Mac IIvx introduced last fall, and it has three NuBus expansion slots instead of one.

In terms of performance, it replaces the Quadra 700, which was discontinued a few months ago. The main processor is a 25-megahertz Motorola 68040 chip, which holds its own with all but the fastest Intel i486DX chips. (Apple also offers the Centris 650 in a minimal configuration with the 68LC040 chip, the same one used in the Centris 610.)

The base price of the Centris 650 is $3,189 for a system with 8 megabytes of system memory and an 80-megabyte hard drive. But by the time the user adds a bigger hard disk, a monitor, a keyboard and so on, the cost is likely to swell to about $5,000, giving the buyer a mid-range Macintosh for about the same cost as a high-end PC.

D. J. Hacker (that is his real name), a former board member of the New York Macintosh Users Group and now president of Premiere Graphics International in Manhattan, said he was generally impressed by the Centris 650.

"It's a good machine, although I was disappointed by two things," he said. "I'm not crazy about the case or the new industrial design. You can't just pack it in a case and go. And I have mixed feelings about the new memory architecture."

He was referring to the type of SIMM's, or single in-line memory modules, used in both Centris models. They are different from the SIMM's used in earlier Macintoshes, so it is not possible to take memory from an older Mac and plug it into a Centris. On the bright side, "you can add SIMM's one at a time instead of four at a time, and in the long run that's an improvement," Mr. Hacker said. ■

Gordon E. Eubanks Jr.

Born: Nov. 7, 1946; Cambridge, Mass.

Home: Saratoga, Calif.

Education: Bachelor's, electrical engineering, Oklahoma State; master's, computer science, Naval Postgraduate School.

Drives: 1990 BMW 735il.

Hobbies: Stamp collecting, any sport ("I'm a very competitive person. I just can't do something without trying to win.")

Recent noncomputer reading: "Jurassic Park," by Michael Crichton.

Family: Single.

PC: Toshiba 4400C. "I don't use a desktop any more."

GORDON EUBANKS is president and chief executive of the Symantec Corporation of Cupertino, Calif. A former Navy officer on nuclear attack and missile submarines, Mr. Eubanks has skippered Symantec to more than $200 million in annual sales through such products as the Norton Utilities, Symantec Antivirus and various development tools. Last week, the company acquired ACT!, maker of the leading contact management software, useful for keeping track of sales leads.

In March, Mr. Eubanks was indicted, along with Gene Wang, now a Symantec vice president, on 33 felony counts for allegedly using electronic mail to steal trade secrets while Mr. Wang was employed at Borland International Inc., a Symantec rival. A trial date in the case, filed in Santa Clara and involving California trade secret and conspiracy law, has not been set.

Question: Why does Borland want you to go to prison?

Answer: Well, you should really ask Borland, but I think it's really just a business issue: for hiring Gene Wang. I think this is consistent with the "barbarian" culture Borland has.

But I want to be emphatic, I haven't committed a crime. There's a long way between a small-town D.A. getting an indictment and a jury of competent individuals looking at the facts. We're outraged that they want to keep all the evidence secret. We've been fighting very hard to put all the evidence on the table.

A crime is a very specific thing. Now, something could be stupid, something could lack intelligence . . . I'm not saying it's any of that, but the specific thing is, is it a crime?

Q: The district attorney thinks it is.

A: Well, he wants the law to be different than it is. He's indicted Gene and myself, 33 felonies, based on the fact that he wants the law to be different than it is. That's pretty outrageous. How would you like to be a test of what the law ought to be? It's like getting a ticket for going 55. The guy says, "Well, we think the limit ought to be 45," and you can go to court and fight it but you're going to be guilty of speeding. As absurd as that sounds, that's exactly what this is about. I don't think anyone independent thinks that it involves technical and scientific information, which is the criterion.

Q: How are you taking this, personally?

A: It's embarrassing. It has certainly damaged my reputation significantly. I accept that. I take responsibility for my actions. I certainly don't look to put the blame on other people. But really, it's having no impact on me on a day-to-day basis. This is the most time I've spent on it this week.

Q: Yes, you probably have other things to do, like competing with Microsoft. Can smaller companies compete against a giant like Microsoft that sells programs for $99?

A: I think we're in a superb position. You have to make a decision in life, whether your goal is to get into a hissing contest with Microsoft, or whether it's to find markets where you can really serve customers.

We're not out to go head to head with Microsoft just for the pleasure of doing that. We find ways to work with them much more than we find ways to work against them. We certainly do compete, but we don't look to do that. We look for segments where we can be out from under their feet.

The second thing is that Microsoft doesn't start this $99 pricing. What happens is that when other people do it, they're willing to do it. It's not smart to start a price war with someone who has a lot more money than you.

What do these

Will bringing in new technology really help bring in new business?

EDS helped Norwich Union Healthcare answer yes.

Norwich Union Healthcare has experienced tremendous growth. The company didn't even exist two years ago. It was created by the Norwich Union Group, one of the leading private insurers in the U.K., to generate new business. And with the help and flexibility of EDS hardware and software systems, Norwich is definitely generating new business. Today they're the U.K.'s fourth largest private [illegible]

It took EDS just six months to integrate the systems. They help Norwich develop new products quickly. They also help Norwich provide more and better choices of healthcare coverage than the competition.

Independent treasurer brokers use the systems as well. They help brokers win new business, which means even more business for Norwich.

"The EDS systems help us provide the finest health claim service in the U.K.," says Brian Haigh, operations director. "And the systems have helped us go from zero to 220,000 customers in less than two years."

Can better technology really translate into better products and better sales?

EDS helped Prince answer a smashing yes.

Using sophisticated Unigraphics technology from EDS, Prince Manufacturing has created the most advanced tennis racquet on the market today. It's called the Prince Vortex. And just six months after its introduction, it's already Prince's top-selling racquet.

Unigraphics is a computer-aided design and manufacturing system based on client/server technology, that speeds up the design process. With it, Prince can now construct 10 different racquet designs in the time it used to take to construct one. And design changes that used to take weeks can now be accomplished in days. As a result, Prince can get its new and better products to market a lot sooner.

Response to the Vortex from customers and retailers has been overwhelming. And Vortex sales are already 28 percent higher than Prince's next best-selling racquet.

"In the highly competitive tennis racquet industry, we count on technology," says Steve Davis, director of research and development at Prince, "to improve the quality of our products. A significant percentage of the improvements found in our racquets today can be credited to using EDS Unigraphics."

As your business grows, can you maintain the agility to outmaneuver competitors?

With the help of EDS, Riser Foods answered yes.

Supermarket chain Riser Foods has become a regional powerhouse thanks, in part, to a new information technology system integrated by EDS.

The system helped cut costs, improve customer service, and enhance the company's competitive agility. Riser now uses a consolidated data processing system to coordinate all critical activities—from product pricing to warehouse management. This has lessened operating costs while improving Riser's customer service.

The EDS system also cuts the time it takes for stores to order and receive merchandise. Orders entered directly into hand-held computers are transmitted to the Riser warehouse. As soon as the warehouse receives the order, it can be processed and shipped in a few hours instead of days.

This ensures that each store provides its customers with the right merchandise at the right price, when they want it. "Streamlined technology has helped us increase profits by 14% and margins by 35%," says Anthony Sego, Chairman and CEO of Riser Foods. "EDS helped us gain a big edge over our competition and continues to help us increase our lead."

When your customers get better service, will they get it from you?

EDS helped Southwestern Bell Telephone Company answer yes.

Southwestern Bell Telephone uses an information technology system from EDS that helps maximize worker productivity and increase efficiency. The system is also helping the company slow the growth of operating costs while actually improving customer service.

The EDS Integrated Force Management System enhances productivity by streamlining the administration, planning, control and reporting of Southwestern Bell's operator force. Almost 5,000 operators serve Southwestern Bell customers in five states. Among other things, the system forecasts operator activity and service requirements to calculate work schedules. Customers get prompt assistance no matter what time of the day or night they need an operator.

"EDS is helping us serve our customers better," says Gary Meuer, division manager for Southwestern Bell's Operator Services. "The EDS system helps us contain escalating operating costs, which also benefits our customers."

Wrestling Over the Key to the Codes

By JOHN MARKOFF

MOUNTAIN VIEW, Calif.

IN the obscure world of computer cryptography, there may be no more self-consciously ornery group of coders than the Cypherpunks, an alliance of some of Silicon Valley's best programmers and hardware designers, who preach absolute privacy in the information age.

The Cypherpunks, who often communicate among themselves by electronic mail protected with an encryption system popular in the computing underground, feel certain about one thing: The Government should not be creating a national encoding standard, as the Clinton Administration has recently proposed.

"The Government proposal suppresses secure cryptography and replaces it with false cryptography," said Eric Hughes, an independent software designer in Silicon Valley who is one of the founders of the Cypherpunks.

The Administration wants to establish a national voice and data encryption standard as a compromise between those like the Cypherpunks who advocate absolute electronic privacy and Federal bodies like the National Security Agency and the F.B.I., who insist on the need for law enforcement agencies to be able to monitor electronic communications.

The proposed standard, designed by the N.S.A., would permit F.B.I. and other law enforcement officials to decode encrypted data when they have a legal warrant to wiretap.

Because the N.S.A. design would remain a classified secret, sealed in tamper-proof computer chips, the system's underlying technology would not be subject to review and testing by civilian computer experts. That raises deep suspicion among folks like the Cypherpunks, whose views on computer privacy have spawned an electronic pamphlet, "The Crypto Anarchist Manifesto," which espouses privacy without government interference, and ends with a passionate call to action: "Arise. You have nothing to lose but your barbed-wire fences."

A U.S. computer-code standard? Not for the Cypherpunks.

Even more low-key civilian computer experts harbor suspicions that the N.S.A. may have built a secret "trapdoor" into the encryption system that could allow unauthorized surveillance — a fear that the N.S.A. insists is groundless.

Civilian computer experts also say that their inability to test the inner workings of the technology gives them little certainty that the encryption system is secure enough to defeat the efforts of the legion hackers who will surely try to break the code.

The controversy is raising public awareness of cryptography, an arcane field of mathematics that researchers describe as "the art or science of hiding information in plain sight." Modern cryptography works by tranforming data into a form unreadable by anyone who does not hold the secret decryption key.

For centuries — until the recent widespread availability of personal computers — secret codes have largely remained the province of spies and military men. Even today, American-made hardware or software containing advanced coding technology is treated as restricted technology by the Government. Along with weapons systems like jet fighters and tanks, encryption hardware and software can't be exported without a license from the State Department.

THE computer and communications industries, however, have increasingly come to view cryptography not as a national-security issue but as an essential ingredient in the multitude of new data and voice services envisioned as part of the emerging national data highway.

Larry Dyer/Wired

With more and more of the nation's personal and private business existing as digital information that can be transmitted — and copied — in nanoseconds, there is a growing need to safeguard such information, be it a doctor's cellular phone call to a patient or a corporation's computer files on its latest takeover target.

"Electronic communication will be the fabric of tomorrow's society, and we will have daily interaction with intimates that we can only rarely afford to visit in person," said Whitfield Diffie, a computer researcher at Sun Microsystems and one of the nation's leading cryptographers. "By codifying the Government's power to spy invisibly on these contacts, we take a giant step toward a world in which privacy belongs only to the wealthy, the powerful and, perhaps, the criminals."

Members of Congress, including Edward J. Markey, the Massachusetts Democrat who is chairman of the House telecommunications subcommittee, have asked how the Government can expect its plan to work unless it simultaneously bans all other use of cryptography beyond the officially sanctioned scheme, known as the Clipper Chip. Without such a law, anyone who wants to hide data from law enforcement investigators could simply send a stream of already coded information through the Clipper system — effectively making it undecipherable to even the Government's most powerful computers. But at a briefing held in Washington last month after the announcement of the Clipper program, Government officials said they had no plans to outlaw competing cryptography systems.

PRESIDENT CLINTON has ordered a classified review of the nation's cryptography policies, scheduled to be complete this summer. The outcome of the review is likely to determine whether the Government pushes to adopt Clipper for voice communications, and a companion system known as Capstone for computer traffic, as national standards. Rather than using coercion, the Government apparently hopes that widespread adoption by Federal agencies — a lucrative market for computer and communications companies — and the potential for allowing general export of products based on Clipper or Capstone would motivate industry to adopt the technology as a de facto standard.

Modern cryptographic techniques fall into several different categories. Traditionally, coding schemes had required that both the sender and the receiver of a message have access to the same secret key. The key is typically a lengthy number that can be plugged into the coding algorithm — the mathematical instructions that "scramble" the information into code form. But sending the key to a person to whom one then intends to send a coded message is not only cumbersome; it risks letting the key fall into the wrong hands.

Seeking to avoid this single-key problem, Mr. Diffie and Martin Hellman, a Stanford University computer scientist, invented "public key" cryptography in 1976. In their system, which has found its way into various encryption programs now on the market, every person gets a pair of keys, one public and one private. The public keys are published or otherwise disseminated, just as telephone numbers are. But the private keys are closely guarded secrets. To transmit a secret message, the sender encodes it with the receiver's public key. When the receiver obtains the scrambled message it can be read only with the correct private key.

The advantage of the Diffie-Hellman public key scheme is that it eliminates the need for the sender and receiver of a message to share secret information — the key — before communicating.

THAT has been the principal limitation of the Data Encryption Standard, which for the past 15 years has been the national cryptographic standard but is seen as too cumbersome for modern electronic commerce.

D.E.S. was originally developed during the 1960's by I.B.M. researchers and then modified by the N.S.A. There has been endless speculation that there is a flaw or trapdoor in the standard that makes possible unauthorized decoding of information encrypted with D.E.S. But the D.E.S. formula is publicly available, and despite years of probing by some of the world's best researchers, no practical weakness has ever been identified. It has been suspected, however, that the N.S.A. or anyone else putting a supercomputer to the task of trying endless combinations of keys can unlock a D.E.S.-encoded message in a matter or hours.

N.S.A. officials insist their new system has no known built-in weakness and researchers at the National Institute of Standards and Technology say that is because the Clipper key is 80 computer bits of information long, compared with 56 bits for D.E.S. The new algorithm is 16 million times as secure.

But public cryptography experts like Mr. Diffie say they may never share that certainty, because the Government will not let the algorithm be examined by anyone who does not have a national security clearance.

Calling for electronic privacy without Federal interference.

And Mr. Diffie and many of his industry colleagues are unwilling to obtain such clearance because they believe it would compromise their ability to perform independent research.

And so cryptographic renegades like the Cypherpunks will probably stick with their own coding systems. The one currently in vogue is PGP, for pretty good privacy. Designed by a Colorado programmer, Phil Zimmerman, the PGP public-key coding system is freely available on computer networks and can be used on many different types of computers and workstations.

But as is so often the case in matters cryptographic, PGP has it own fog of controversy. It turns out that Mr. Zimmerman based PGP on public-key work done by three other American cryptographers: Ronald Rivest, Adi Shamir and Leonard Adelman. Their encryption system has been patented by RSA Data Security, a Redwood City, Calif., software company.

And RSA executives have been threatening to file patent-infringement suits against computer operators who make the PGP program available on their systems. The fight has spawned copious electronic messaging in the computer underground — mostly written in code, of course.■

Utilities Brace for a Buyer's Market in Electricity

Cut-rate producers win access for wholesale deals. Will retail be next?

By LEAH BETH WARD

COULD shopping for electricity be just an "800" number away? Deregulation has made bargain hunters of once-captive customers in markets like long-distance telecommunications, natural gas and trucking. Electricity, many experts say, is next.

Though competition has been creeping up on the electric utility industry for several years, a recent change in the Federal Energy Policy Act has further shifted market clout from sellers to buyers at the wholesale level. Although utilities shudder at the notion, big retail customers like factories and shopping malls — and even homeowners banding together in neighborhood buying pools — may be on the phone within a couple of years haggling over prices with electricity marketers.

The change in the Federal energy law curbed utilities' monopoly control over their transmission lines. Now, a utility must act as the middleman when its lines are needed to transmit power purchased by another utility from a third party, often a low-cost independent producer of energy.

What's more, Congress left to the states the possibility of providing such mandated access to transmission lines when the purchases are made directly by retail customers. At least four states — California, Michigan, New Mexico and Texas — are experimenting with, or considering, access at the retail level.

Congress sees mandated access as a way to make utilities more competitive on prices — and most industry experts say the companies will indeed be forced to respond. The traditionally inflexible utility that operated on a cost-plus basis will become a leaner company disciplined by market forces, the experts say.

"Soon, we'll start calling customers what they really are: shoppers," said William Eglinton, executive vice president of the Public Service Company of New Mexico, an Albuquerque-based utility.

But the change in the law brings with it new complexities and uncertainties that promise to shake up the industry's basic structure as well as its prices — and in ways that could send bills higher for some business and residential consumers even as they are lowered for others.

Mandated access is a product of a bruising battle between the utilities, which have an obligation to serve all customers in a geographic area, and the independent energy producers, which strike deals wherever they can.

The independents, also known as nonutility generators, were doing well even before the law changed. Without the burden of having to maintain a huge infrastructure, as the utilities must, they were able to charge much less for their power. Some utilities made the pricing gap worse by building too much generating capacity, counting on regulators to provide guaranteed rates of return.

But when it came to delivering the electricity, the independent generating companies were at the mercy of the utilities — and utilities with their own excess power to sell were often merciless.

"Some utilities would impose so many terms and conditions and charge so much that they could block access without saying that's what they were doing," said Linda Hensley, who purchases power for the Sacramento Municipal Utility District in California.

Now that access is mandated, and customers can count on delivery, the independents are booming. More than 700 plants are on their drawing boards. Between now and the end of 1996, the independents are expected to add 65 percent more generating capacity than will be brought on-line by the utility industry, according to the Utility Data Institute.

BOTH the utilities and the independents are waiting for rules from the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission that will spell out details of the change in the law, which was enacted late last year. The rules will determine how transmission access is to be enforced and, more important, how it will be priced. The regulations are expected over the next nine months or so.

Many utilities are resigned to the change and some even see mandated transmission as a source of revenue. "There's money to be made," said Dennis Beals, manager of power contracts, development and administration at the Arizona Public Service Company.

But Mr. Beals also says "it's a very real possibility" that independents will take some municipal utility customers from his company.

Indeed, similar fears at other utilities have raised concerns that mandated access could make utility prices less competitive. For instance, if a utility lost too many customers to outside suppliers, it would be left with excess generating capacity. And if the outside supplier took away the best customers, a practice known as cherry picking, the utility would be stuck with those that are least profitable. The changes could force the utility to seek higher rates.

Utilities that cannot cut overhead enough to compete on price may face the hard choice of quitting the power-producing end of the business, making them simply carriers and distributors of other producers' power, some people in the industry say.

"You are going to see fewer high-cost producers trying to force their product down unwilling throats," said Gordon Goodman, vice president of the Howell Corporation, an independent producer based in Houston.

Lurking in the background is still one more uncertainty: the possibility of an energy glut. If the independents build too many new plants, competition could turn lethal, leading to a shakeout. And that, some experts say, could lead to disruptions of service, especially if enough independents force enough utilities out of the generating business and then themselves go bankrupt.

"This is not a totally elastic market," said Jeff Freeman, a spokesman for Cogentrix Inc. of Charlotte, N.C., which owns and operates 10 plants in the Southeast. "There has to be planning."

One of those in the planning stage is Howell, a newly formed affiliate of the Howell Companies, an oil and gas exploration concern. The new unit is searching for potential buyers of electricity it would generate at a natural gas processing plant in the gas-rich San Juan Basin of New Mexico.

WORKING with Conoco Inc. and the Bechtel Group, the giant construction company, Howell hopes to build the plant in Bloomfield, near Farmington, N.M., and then buy transmission capacity from Arizona Public Service, among others, to send the power to utilities in Nevada and California.

Arizona Public Service and other utilities own power plants in the same area of northwest New Mexico and will not want to lose business to Howell. Moreover, Arizona Public Service's lines to the west of that area are full, Mr. Beals said. To provide transmission service to Howell, he said, "would probably require major transmission upgrades or building."

Costs like that help to explain why the battle between the utilities and the independents is far from over. The price of transmission is the big issue now, noted Peter Jump, a transmission specialist at the Edison Electric Institute, the utility industry's trade association in Washington.

Just what costs should the Federal Energy Regulatory Commission allow utilities to include in their transmission charges? Should it allow the inclusion of opportunity costs — the costs a utility incurs when it loses a chance to sell its own power because its lines are full of someone else's? And what about the cost of building extra transmission lines? If that is not included, retail customers may be stuck with the tab.

"The law says that our other customers are not supposed to be harmed by transmission access," said Mr. Jump of the utility trade group. "But our problem is that we have to make sure that when F.E.R.C. prices this, they adequately compensate our customers. We're afraid they will underprice this service."

Faced with these unknowns, some utilities are talking about breaking up their generation, transmission and retail distribution segments into separate profit centers or even new affiliates.

Utilities with high-cost generating plants will sell those assets and stick to distributing power for others, said Tom C. Wray, a state senator in New Mexico and an advocate of retail transmission access. Some will develop their own power production affiliates to compete with the independents in far-flung markets outside their home states. Still others may become major transmission owners, acting like common carriers.

AND with all of this new risk, traditional utility regulation and its guaranteed rates of return must also change, says Mr. Eglinton of Public Service of New Mexico. Already, utilities like San Diego Gas and Electric are proposing incentive-based regulation that would tie profits to a company's overall performance.

Clearly, a better performance will be the key to holding on to the shopping malls, factories and residential users that have long been the industry's bread-and-butter customers.

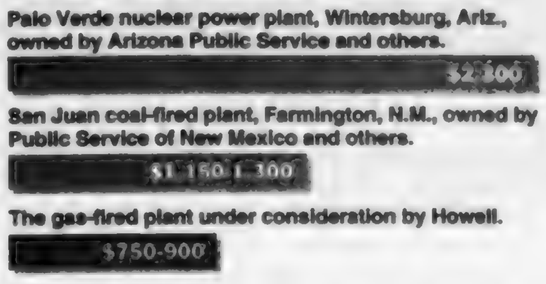
"If we don't compete, we could lose that market," warns William H. Clagett, the administrator of the Western Area Power Administration, a Federal agency that markets hydroelectric power. "And all you will need is an 800 number and an accounting system." ■

Leah Beth Ward, a journalist based in Santa Fe, N.M., often writes about the energy industry.

Cut-Rate Prices and Mandated Transmission . . .

Many independent power producers are planning to build plants because they are now guaranteed access to utility transmission lines. For example, the Howell Corporation of Houston is considering building a natural-gas-fired plant in Bloomfield, N.M. Howell could then send its electricity over lines owned by a number of utilities in the Southwest that charge far more for their power because of higher generating costs.

What it cost those utilities to build a kilowatt of electric-generating capacity – enough power to light ten 100-watt bulbs – and an estimate of Howell's costs:



Palo Verde nuclear power plant, Wintersburg, Ariz., owned by Arizona Public Service and others.
$2,100
San Juan coal-fired plant, Farmington, N.M., owned by Public Service of New Mexico and others.
$1,150-1,300
The gas-fired plant under consideration by Howell.
$750-900

A change in Federal law forces utilities to open up their power lines.

Power and State Politics

A FEW years ago, Dale H. Fox, a furniture manufacturer in Albuquerque, N.M., bought a generator and stuck it outside his factory. The electric bills from the local power company were driving him out of business, he said.

But then Mr. Fox sought to carry things a step further. He wanted to use the utility's lines to ship power from his generator to his retail store several miles away. No deal, said the utility, the Public Service Company of New Mexico. If Mr. Fox stopped buying the utility's power, other customers would be stuck paying for that portion of the poles, lines and power plants built to serve him. And other defectors might follow him, the utility argued, causing rates to soar for those left behind.

But Mr. Fox wouldn't be stopped, at least not politically. This year, he led a coalition of energy users that pressed the state legislature for a law requiring utilities to open their power lines to retail customers. State Senator Tom C. Wray, an Albuquerque Republican and devotee of free markets, gladly took up the cause.

Public Service, already unpopular in New Mexico because of its prices, said it would consider providing retail access, but only if certain protections are provided to the company and those customers who, unlike Mr. Fox, cannot stick generators outside their homes or businesses. As a compromise, the issue will be studied and reintroduced in the 1995 Legislature.

"I'm confident we will have it in 1995," said Mr. Wray, a former electrical engineer at the utility who has been critical of the company's management and pricing policies. As for Mr. Fox, he is campaigning for mayor on the issue of lower electric rates for everyone, through retail access.

Rationing Is Not a Health-Care Choice

To the Editor:

"Rationing Care? Let the Patient Do It" (Viewpoints, April 25), by Dr. Robert A. Levine, proposes that we ration health care by offering insurance policies that deny life-saving measures based on the patient's age or statistical odds of long-term survival as a functioning person. Such proposals are both obscene and unnecessary.

They are obscene because the person who decides to withhold care, even though in Dr. Levine's plan that person is the policy-holder, is playing God. The suggestion to withhold cardiac surgery from everyone over age 75 is tantamount to a decision that life past 75 is not worthwhile. What do we do then for baby sitters? Grandparents of the world unite, you have nothing to lose but your pains!

In 1903, in his farewell address to the Johns Hopkins University, William Osler, as satire, reminded us that Trollope once described a college to which all men retired at age 60 "for a year of contemplation before a peaceful departure by chloroform." Dr. Osler even suggested that men were not much good after age 40. He exempted women. Where and how would Dr. Levine draw the line?

Dr. Levine wants to reduce the cost of caring for elders in the last six months of life. Alas, we have no meter by which to determine that the last six months have arrived. Lacking that, let us see what the costs of health care in those terminal months are. In 1992, the total Medicare bill was $116 billion (of a total health-care cost estimated at $840 billion). Dr. Levine states that 21 percent of Medicare costs were for the last six months of life; that's $24.4 billion, or less than 3 percent of our total national health bill.

Nearly all that cost comes from hospitalization. There are better ways of handling terminal illness. We need more and better long-term care facilities and hospices and more support for home care. These less expensive, and often more humane and sensitive measures can substitute for more costly, and no more effective, care. Let's find the right target for health-care economies. It is malpractice to prescribe before a diagnosis has been made.

Other Takes on Recycling

To the Editor:

Regarding "Who Foots the Bill for Recycling?" (April 25), it is true that we are spending increasing amounts of money to dispose of solid waste and that the financial burden falls largely on local governments' already strained coffers, competing for funding with other needed services. However, the cost of recycling is not the main culprit. In fact, almost $29 billion of the $30 billion Americans will spend this year to dispose of municipal solid wastes pays for landfilling and incineration — not recycling.

The recommendation that manufacturers bear responsibility for the disposal of their products and packaging is a good one. The United States bears the unwelcome distinction of being the nation that produces the most solid waste — in total and per capita. Packaging constitutes about one-third of all municipal solid waste.

JAMIE HORWITZ
Philadelphia, April 28

The author is program associate, conservation and the environment, at the Pew Charitable Trusts.

To the Editor:

It is true that "five years after recycling took hold in this country, it has become clear that the market value of the materials left at the curbside is not likely to cover the collection and processing costs for a long time." But it is also irrelevant. The key question is not whether recycling pays for itself, but whether it is cheaper than traditional collection and disposal. Recycling is cost-effective. A city of one million whose landfill costs equal the national average of $26 a ton can save $7 million a year with recycling.

Other points: First, composting plays a key role in municipal programs; almost one third of solid waste is compostable. Second, recycling costs drop as the amount recycled rises. Finally, consider the second-order economic benefits of recycling and composting. Compared with landfilling, recycling creates nine times more jobs and composting creates seven times more jobs.

We agree that manufacturers need to become more responsible for their products. One effective strategy would be to require that they use much more scrap in their products.

To the Editor:

Packaging industries are helping to bear the burden for the cost of recycling. Our industry, for one, has been instrumental in providing technical and educational support to municipal recycling programs. In many states, we have subsidized the growth of recyclers. Most important, we are committed to creating markets for all industrial-grade recycled glass. We have, in fact, spent tens of millions of dollars to recycle glass in the last decade. And it's working. In 1992, one of every three glass containers was recycled.

To the Editor:

Commingled collection may help to alleviate the costs of mandated recycling goals. Commingling allows pickup crews to handle all recyclables in one container instead of in two or three. Material separation takes place at the recycling center, not at the curbside.

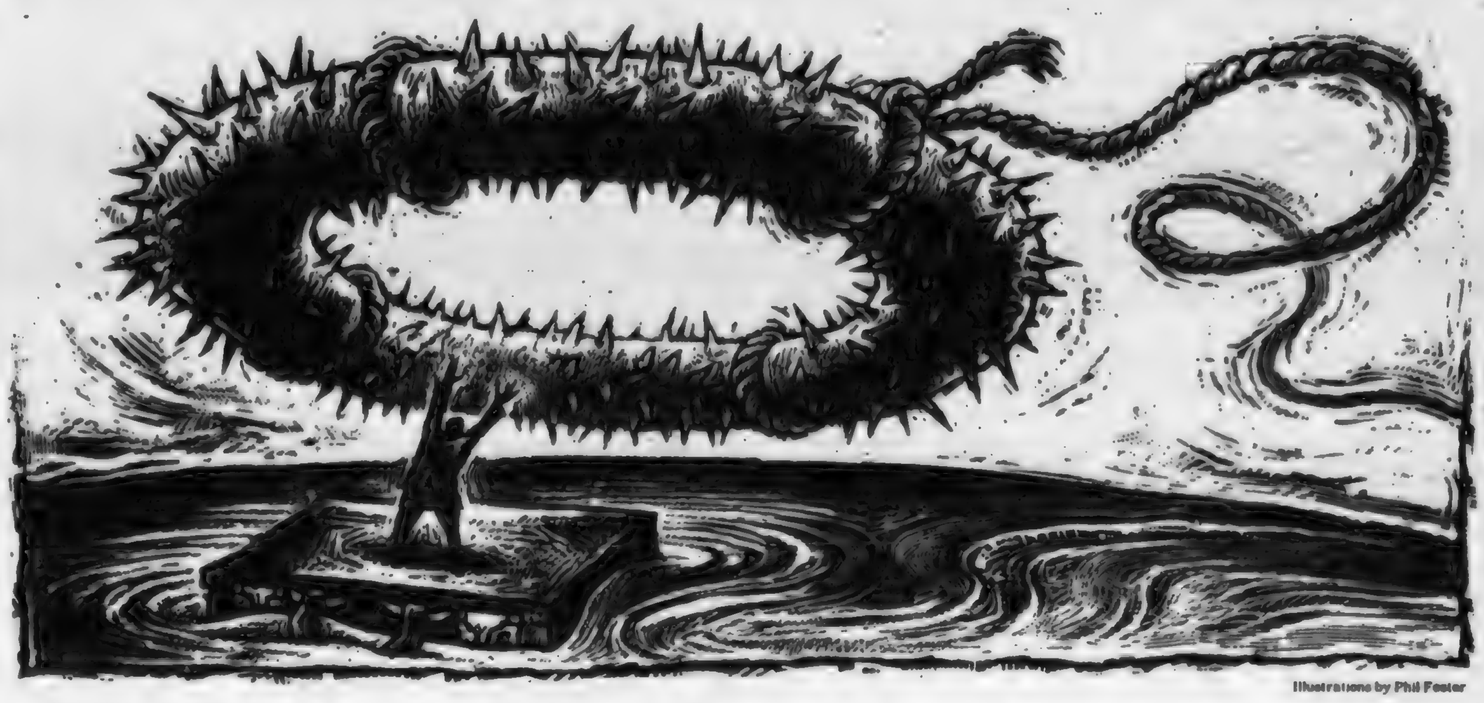
Clinton Business Plan: Help Unwanted



Illustrations by Phil Foster

By AMAR BHIDE

THE Clinton Administration loves entrepreneurs because they create jobs, but its programs may be in conflict with its affections. On the one hand, the Administration's efforts to help small businesses raise money will benefit only a few of them. On the other hand, many of these small ventures will be hit hard by the Clinton proposals to raise taxes and mandate job benefits.

There are exceptions, of course. A few startups in biotechnology and other glamour industries may like the proposed tax preferences for capital gains, for instance. But, for the average entrepreneur, the Clinton small-business package — capital gains preferences, looser business-loan regulations and investment tax credits — is underwhelming.

This conclusion is based on several years of research, during which my associates and I interviewed the founders of 100 companies on the 1989 Inc. magazine list of the 500 fastest-growing American companies. These companies are typical of successful startups. The average company on the list had 135 employees, $15 million in revenue in 1988, and sales growth of 1,407 percent over five years.

We learned that external financing played only a minor role in these enterprises; most were bootstrapped with personal funds. Specifically, more than 80 percent were financed through the founders' personal savings, credit cards, second mortgages and, in one case, "a $50 check that bounced." Most startups also relied on retained earnings to finance growth.

These results are not unique. A nationwide survey of nearly 500 software companies concluded that 68 percent were self-financed. And in an Inc. magazine survey of all the companies on its "500" lists between 1982 and 1989, 75 percent said they were principally self-financed.

Why don't fledgling enterprises seek venture capital? The answer is simple. They cannot meet the criteria that venture capitalists must use to stay in business for the long haul. Venture capitalists incur significant operating costs. This means they can only back ventures that represent a potential home run, that have founders with considerable reputations, and that have well-defined plans.

Startups seldom have any of these requisites — and they won't acquire them as a result of the Clinton proposals. Lower capital gains taxes simply won't induce venture capitalists to invest in companies that don't meet their basic criteria.

As for banks, they too are generally unwilling to make loans to small, growing firms unless the firms are well-collateralized by high quality receivables and by the entrepreneurs' personal assets. Even with atypical startups that can satisfy these conditions, the banks are still wary. If the business fails, even well-secured loans can prove difficult to collect. And if the business takes off, the entrepreneur may well move to a larger bank that doesn't touch small business loans.

The Clinton plan to loosen bank regulations and to encourage "character" loans may help the stable, well-established small business. But these changes won't get bank loans for fast-growing companies and for entrepreneurs without a long track record. And these are the very job-creators the Administration says it wants to help.

THE investment tax credit also means little to young businesses because they must keep their fixed investments to a minimum. The typical startup "invests" in product development, marketing, training and other soft assets — not in the machines and bricks that qualify for the credit.

On the other hand, the Administration's proposed tax increases, both personal and corporate, could debilitate these young companies. One needn't be a supply-sider to see that after-tax profits are vital for entrepreneurs who can't get capital anywhere else.

Other Clinton initiatives, such as health-care reforms, also pose special threats to new businesses. These job-making startups are labor-intensive, not capital-intensive. They are therefore highly vulnerable to reforms that raise the cost of employment.

Bootstrappers are both hardy and invaluable. Like weeds, they flourish in difficult terrain and without much sustenance. And they don't just create jobs. Forced to hire poorly qualified or unskilled employees, bootstrappers effectively operate a practical, on-the-job training program that should have the Department of Labor turning cartwheels. Unfortunately for the policy wonks, they can't be helped with clever programs. But they can be hurt by higher costs imposed by the government. ■

Brand New! The Glazed Donut Fund

By JOE QUEENAN

THERE are now 3,578 mutual funds in the United States. This means that mutual funds outnumber the stocks on the New York Stock Exchange.

These funds come in all shapes and sizes. There are, or have been, a Hawaiian Fund, an Astrologer's Fund, a Catholic bond fund, assorted socially conscious funds, and hedge funds. There are insider funds and there are index funds that simply buy all the stocks in a particular market category. There are single country funds, single state funds, single industry funds. There are even funds sold by companies that primarily sell light bulbs and airline seats. (General Electric announced in January its plan to market a family of six funds, while American Airlines is already peddling funds to its passengers.)

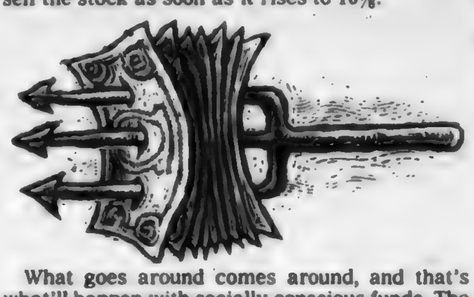
In theory, 3,578 mutual funds should be enough to satisfy just about any investment criteria, especially when the average equity fund underperformed the Standard & Poor's 500 by more than a percentage point last quarter. But marketers don't care about theory. If things get out of hand, we might see these new offerings soon:

One likely favorite will be the Nosferatu Fund. Taking its name from the old vampire film, this fund will ferret out bargains in the stocks of companies widely presumed dead. It will overlap with the Nostalgia Fund, which will buy only blue chips like I.B.M. — companies that were safe investments in the 1960's but now may be headed for oblivion.

Guilt will also be a future marketing tool. In the United States today, socially conscious funds screen out companies that market alcohol, weapons or tobacco, or that discriminate against employees by sex or race. But what of a socially conscious Third World country fund? This gap will soon be filled by the Pakistani Ethical Money Market Fund and the Emerging, Morally Irreproachable Turkish Growth Fund.

Salespeople are another key to future fund growth. The possibilities here are limitless. The Wholesome Adolescent Fund will be marketed by Girl Scouts door to door. And the Wicker and Gossamer Fund will be peddled by proprietors of those twee "country things" boutiques. (Some of these shopkeepers may sign on with a competitor, Parsley, Sage, Rosemary 'n' Funds.)

But marketing's not everything. New investment strategies will emerge in the coming decade, and one of the best may be the 16¾ to 16⅞ Fund. This computer-driven index fund will buy every stock, regardless of its industry, earnings or prospects, as soon as its price hits 16¾. It will sell the stock as soon as it rises to 16⅞.



What goes around comes around, and that's what'll happen with socially conscious funds. The Satanic Fund will service sociopathic investors determined to support companies that wreck the environment, encourage substance abuse or cause cancer. Come to think of it, Drexel Burnham may have had one of these funds in registration just before it went under. ■

Wall Street: The Reason It's Far From Washington

By KARL ZINSMEISTER

PRESIDENT CLINTON has unveiled a multibillion-dollar "industrial policy" for the United States. His plan would allow Federal agencies to subsidize companies and technologies deemed important to our future — in essence committing the Federal Government to the venture-capital business. Well-intentioned public employees, the President believes, will succeed at building productive enterprises where American investors, corporations and financial markets could not.

Hundreds of case histories, in this country and elsewhere, suggest that expensive boondoggles are the likelier product of this effort. The recent past, in this nation alone, furnishes plenty of proof. Why would anyone want to push more money and authority toward the people and policies that have produced today's National Aeronautics and Space Administration, the Department of Defense procurement program, and our crazy farm subsidies?

The major problem with government industrial policies, history shows, is that they politicize important chunks of the economy. Once a money tap is running, lawmakers claw and scratch to keep it on, regardless of the results. This is the story of the SST program in the 1970's. It is the story of Jimmy Carter's synthetic fuels industry. It is the story of the Clinch River breeder reactor, which ate $5 billion from 1969 to 1983 without ever producing electricity economically.

Many industrial policy advocates hold incredibly naïve views of politics. Economist Herbert Stein, who has considerable Washington experience, provides a more realistic picture of the way such a policy might proceed. He envisions "an Industrial Policy Administration with temporary offices in the Department of Commerce building. It has an administrator, a retired Air Force general who had racked up a record $50 billion of cost overruns. It has a deputy administrator who is a defeated congressman from Indiana. It has several divisions, each headed by an associate professor from a leading business school, the full professors being unable to afford the government salary. ... Every Monday morning, this cast meets in a board room to select projects that will be very good for the country but that will not be profitable enough to attract I.B.M. or A.T.&T. or Merck."

Besides the predictable pork-barreling, government industrial policy will bring on less economic competition and sharply higher trade barriers. It could even spark international economic warfare, because in every place it has ever been attempted industrial policy has been linked to protectionism.

CONSIDER the Congressional Office of Technology Assessment, an influential nest of United States industrial-policy activism these days. The agency recently bemoaned the ability of some foreign firms "to lower production costs, acquire new technologies, and make genuinely superior products at a good price." In response, the agency called for a government industrial policy that includes "trade protection ... framed in a frank and self-respecting way as guarding important American national interests, rather than based on findings of unfair trade by others." Protectionism, pure and simple.

Maybe the most damning evidence against government industrial policy comes from its supposed stronghold — Japan. The great unreported economic story of the last decade or so is the failure of industrial policy in that country. The policy "has had the effect of undermining competition and sheltering inefficient competitors, lowering the overall productivity of the Japanese economy," Harvard professor Michael Porter has written. Many observers concur.

The Japanese know this. They are now rapidly fleeing government direction of their economy — privatizing industries like railways, telecommunications and airlines; shriveling the role of the Ministry of International Trade and Industry; cutting tariffs; and deregulating energy, banking and many other industries. How ironic and foolish it would be for Americans to edge this country into national business management just as the Japanese, sharply chastened, are discarding it. ■

Investment policy? Not from the folks who gave us synfuels and the SST.

Profile/Nemir A. Kirdar

From Political Prisoner to a Banker for Billionaires

Sara Krulwich/The New York Times

Nemir Kirdar, Investcorp's chief executive: "I would probably not have gone into business had circumstances not changed after I was born."

A Scandal, A Prince: The Circle K Bid

THEY won't admit it, but over the course of the last year there must have been times when Nemir A. Kirdar and his partners at Investcorp wondered whether the struggle to acquire Circle K was worth the time and aggravation, let alone the $400 million that the firm bid for the convenience-store chain.

In some respects, the saga of the past year reads like a not-so-funny comic book for investment bankers: Investcorp, which made the only bona fide bid for Circle K, nevertheless had to worry about two competing bids filed by bondholders, one of which was to be financed by a Saudi prince who has yet to materialize. (Neither has his money.)

Strange things happened to Investcorp itself along the way. Two members of its investor group, a Spanish financier, Javier de la Rosa, and a former Kuwaiti finance and oil minister, Sheik Ali al-Khalifa al-Sabah, dropped out of the deal after being linked to a financial scandal.

But analysts said the price Investcorp is paying for Circle K will probably make the wait worthwhile. They also said the company has used its time in bankruptcy well. Since filing in 1990 it has reduced the number of stores to around 2,900, from more than 4,600.

Perhaps more important, environmental claims filed by four states that gasoline storage tanks have contaminated ground water have been capped at $40 million by the bankruptcy judge.

The states claimed the cleanup would cost more than $100 million.

Barbara Wedelstaedt, a high-yield bond analyst at Duff & Phelps/MCM in Chicago, said the cap would "allow them to concentrate on remodeling stores, improving merchandising and turning around the convenience-store operation."

By KENNETH N. GILPIN

NEMIR A. KIRDAR grew up in Iraq and dreamed of following his family into government service. Then, on his way home for lunch 24 years ago, he was picked up by the police and thrown into a windowless cell with 30 or 40 other prisoners. Save the provisions brought in by his wife, he went without food and water for 12 days.

No charges were ever filed, and he was never told why he was detained. He fled the country shortly after his release and went, almost broke, to the United States.

His aspirations to public service in his homeland shattered, Mr. Kirdar has turned to one of the most private of businesses, building an investment bank for the outrageously wealthy in the Persian Gulf. In the decade since he founded it, the bank, Investcorp, has done 44 deals in the United States and Europe, with a total value of close to $5 billion. Mr. Kirdar's firm and its clients now control Saks Fifth Avenue, Carvel ice cream, Color Tile and Dellwood Foods, and once also owned Tiffany, Fox Photo and the Catherines department-store chain. The company also has a 50 percent stake in Gucci. And if the Bankruptcy Court in Arizona approves, Investcorp will own the Circle K Corporation, the convenience-store chain for which the firm bid $400 million. The court's decision is expected within a few weeks.

But unlike many investment bankers, when Mr. Kirdar talks about what he does he does not talk about "doing deals." To hear him describe it, his company's role sounds almost passive.

Mr. Kirdar, Investcorp's president and chief executive, talks about companies in need of "silent capital" to revive themselves on one side, and of extremely wealthy investors looking for potentially lucrative situations. "Investcorp," he said, "is the bridge that brings the two islands together."

In its dealmaking, the firm has tended to focus on privately held retailers, companies that are fundamentally sound but need additional capital. Even in the debt-crazed 1980's, Investcorp was interested in committing cash to a deal ahead of debt, and that tradition continues. And it is not a merchant bank that acquires a company only to break it up — companies are sold as a whole, generally within three to seven years.

The way the 56-year-old Mr. Kirdar and his associates go about their business has won respect on Wall Street and praise from the companies the firm has acquired.

"We have been dealing with them for about a year," a lawyer involved in the Circle K bankruptcy proceeding said, "and my experience with them is that they tend to do what they say they will do."

William Chaney, chairman of Tiffany Inc., Investcorp's first huge success, calls Mr. Kirdar "a brilliant executive and financial person and extremely high principled. I like his philosophy of looking at an acquisition not only from the financial aspects, but also at the basic business concept and management."

Investcorp's success has also heaped coal on Mr. Kirdar's Newcastle: the already wealthy and powerful men in Saudi Arabia, Abu Dhabi, Qatar and other gulf states that are the firm's clients.

"We are the billionaire's investment bank," said Elias N. Hallack, who along with Michael J. Merritt serves as Investcorp's co-chief operating officer.

Investcorp caters to its more than 250 clients by putting up its own equity to do a deal, then asking if they want to participate. "I don't think any other investment bank that I know of does this," Mr. Kirdar said.

In addition to buying and selling companies, Investcorp offers its clients medium- to long-term investments in real estate, including a luxury 45-unit condominium at 1049 Fifth Avenue, and does proprietary trading in a number of exotic derivative securities.

Last year was the company's second-best year ever; it earned $62.7 million, up about 20 percent from the year before, on assets of $1.1 billion.

Mr. Kirdar's shareholders, who kicked in $50 million to help get him started in 1982 and added $50 million in 1986, have seen their equity stake grow to just under $440 million, $120 million of which has been paid back in the form of a 15 percent dividend every year since Investcorp opened its doors.

SINCE the firm's founding, the stake of Investcorp's partners has risen to 37.5 percent, from just 7.5 percent; there are now about 40 partners. Another 15 percent is held by about 20 people, including some Investcorp board members. The remaining 47.5 percent is held by roughly 10,000 shareholders in the gulf. Investcorp's shares trade on the Bahrain Stock Exchange. The firm's clients, who participate in the deals, are not part of the shareholding group.

Robert V. Glaser, a partner based in New York, describes Investcorp's challenge as "raising money at the pace of the Middle East and being able to use it at the pace of the West." Aside from his financial acumen, Mr. Kirdar's skills include the persuasiveness to line up investors with deep pockets and to hire top talent.

A native of Kirkuk, Iraq, in the nothern part of the country, Mr. Kirdar was born into a family with close ties to the Iraqi monarchy that ruled until 1958, when pan-Arab nationalists seized power in a bloody coup.

"In my childhood, it was my aspiration to be in public service," Mr. Kirdar said in an interview at Investcorp's lavishly paneled Park Avenue office. "I would probably not have gone into business had circumstances not changed after I was born."

Concerned that he was too closely tied to the old regime, Mr. Kirdar emigrated shortly after the Iraqi revolution to Tempe, Ariz., where two cousins lived. Subsequently, he earned a bachelor's degree at the College of the Pacific in California, and got a job as a bank teller in Arizona.

At a family gathering in the early 1960's, Mr. Kirdar's older brother persuaded him to return to Baghdad, saying the political heat had cooled. For a time, his brother's assessment was sound. Mr. Kirdar established a trading firm to represent Western companies in Iraq, as well as to start small industrial companies and sell them. He married; he and his wife, Nada, have two daughters.

Everything changed after his imprisonment in 1969. Although he remains an Iraqi citizen, Mr. Kirdar has never been back. He maintains homes in London and Bahrain, and calls the Pierre Hotel home in New York. Mr. Kirdar pursued a career in international banking in New York; in the mid-1970's he joined Chase Manhattan.

It was at Chase that the seeds for Investcorp were sown. As a member of a group that created a business plan for the Middle East after the first oil price shock in 1973, Mr. Kirdar recommended that Chase establish a merchant bank there. David Rockefeller, Chase's chairman, endorsed the plan, and in 1976 Mr. Kirdar moved to Abu Dhabi.

A YEAR later he had relocated to Bahrain, where his team at Chase would include the managerial nucleus of what is now Investcorp — Mr. Hallack and Mr. Merritt, Mr. Glaser and Savio Tung. William W. Flanz, Mr. Kirdar's boss in Bahrain, eventually left Chase to join Investcorp.

"I went to the gulf in 1976, at the height of the oil boom, and the amount of money that people made there was staggering," Mr. Kirdar said. "At that time, it was tempting to go off on one's own."

Mr. Kirdar freely, almost happily, admits that he no longer runs the show himself at Investcorp. "In 1982 I was very crucial," he said. "But now this company has capabilities of buying deals, structuring them and placing the debt. I am more of a coordinator inside and outside. And some of the time I spend outside is devoted to nonbusiness activities."

Indeed, Mr. Kirdar has finally found the chance for public service. Among other things, he's chairman of the advisory council of Georgetown University's Center for Contemporary Arab Studies, to which Investcorp pledged $2 million two years ago.

"Public service is very close to my heart," Mr. Kirdar said. "To me, this is a fulfillment of some of that desire, especially when you can be involved with educational institutions where you can have an impact on the younger generation." ■

If the Client's a Bummer, She Knows

SECURITIES regulators keep records on the misdeeds of brokers who have ripped off their clients, dispensing the gory details to anyone who bothers to ask. And when clients rip off their brokers? There's a clearinghouse of those sordid activities, too, but don't expect to find it among any public records.

Look instead inside the shopworn lower Manhattan offices of Compliance Data Center, a 30-year-old firm that's made a business of compiling the dirt on investors who stiff their brokers. McKay White, its feisty 62-year-old senior vice president, reigns over the four-person team that operates as a command center for brokerage houses who are sizing up the ethics of prospective clients.

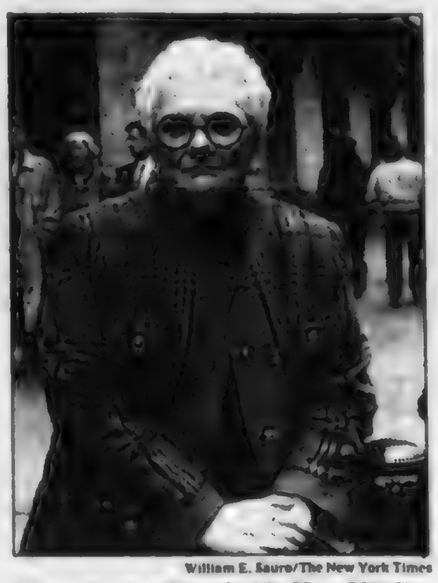
A bad report from Ms. White can effectively block an investor from doing business with the scores of firms that pay the company for supplying facts on investors (not, Ms. White stresses, advice on whether to deal with them). Something as small as an unpaid debit of $96 or as big as a multimillion-dollar ring of check kiters can lead to one of the little "G" notations — for "gray" — alongside an investor's name in the computer.

Business is good for Ms. White, who explains that "when New York Stock Exchange firms have a good year, we have a good year." She won't say just how much her company bills for its detective work, but allows that some firms pay more than $500,000 a year for her services. Leslie C. Quick III, president of Quick & Reilly and a Compliance Data client, said he figures his vendor is doing quite well. "It's a great time for her," he said. "Look at all the accounts being opened."

Brokerage firms ship off computer tapes of their new-client lists to the company each day, supplementing a database already rich with records of regulatory actions, criminal incidents, suspicious advertisements and tips from the securities firms themselves. In all, there are 25 million items stuffed into the company's computers, of which 10 percent are details of no-no's committed by investors.

While much of the information in the company's computers concerns investors who kite checks and renege on trades, the company is also a repository of data on scamsters who entice investors into shady deals. When the Securities and Exchange Commission filed a civil complaint against a bond broker last fall, it was thanks to an initial tip from Compliance Data to the National Association of Securities Dealers.



William E. Sauro/The New York Times

Compliance Data's McKay White

Thomas F. Pirro, assistant operations manager at the company, spotted a suspicious ad in The New York Observer last October that promised $100 a month return on a $5,000 investment, and tipped off the authorities. The company also tipped off its clients: the scamster "had seven active accounts at the time," said Mr. Pirro, who also sent copies of the advertisement to his customers.

Such courtesies to brokerage firms are part of the magic that makes Ms. White a darling of the securities industry. Unlike credit services like TRW, Compliance Data has an ongoing agreement with customers that, once they've supplied the company with a name, the firm will follow up if that investor causes trouble in the future.

That thorough follow-up irritated one scamster enough that, Ms. White says, he stormed into the office and threatened to throw her out the 19th-floor window to the Trinity Church graveyard below — a threat to which she responded with a characteristic string of expletives that apparently frightened him off.

Some securities regulators aren't thrilled with the active role that Compliance Data plays, noting that the brokerage industry would be infuriated if regulators were as aggressive with bad information on brokers as this company is with bad information on investors.

John Perkins, the Missouri state securities commissioner, said that while investors can call his office for information on a broker's past, "we don't call and tell investors these are bad people." But Compliance Data calls customers to let them know that an investor with an account has caused trouble at another firm. The company is also willing to tell a brokerage firm that has lost money where the offending investor's other accounts are.

Ms. White emphasizes that such service is only provided to customers who have made "inquiries" on an investor. But every name on the computer tapes of new customers is considered an "inquiry," so the company has enormous latitude to get the word out if an investor has wronged a brokerage firm.

It also wields clout in the arbitration process. Brokerage firms frequently call Compliance Data to check on the account histories of investors who want to arbitrate. The investor who sues over "unsuitable" options trading had better not pop up on Ms. White's screen with a number of earlier options accounts: the minute that information gets back to the plaintiff's lawyer, "they promptly drop the arbitration," Ms. White said.

There's no pretense at Compliance Data offices about where loyalties lie. "Sure we're advocates" of the brokerage industry, said Ms. White, who contends that "brokerage firms take it on the chin more than customers do." The latter claim would no doubt be met with guffaws by investors who filed 280 of the 316 arbitrations decided at the New York Stock Exchange last year, winning 47 percent of the time. (Brokerage firms, curiously, won 83 percent of the cases they brought against investors.)

Though an animated argument could be staged about which side cheats more, it would be easy to get a consensus on the view of Ms. White. The blunt, five-time divorcee ("I have a low threshold for boredom") jokes openly about her inability to balance a checkbook, and uses language that could almost make a bond trader blush. Expressing the opinion of those who love her and hate her, Mr. Quick summed it up perhaps best of all: "She is some piece of work, that woman." ■

Trying to Copy the Fat Cats at Vanguard

INVESTORS who can't take the pain of choosing among the mind-boggling number of mutual funds on the market frequently try the copycat strategy: mimicking the rich insiders who run a fund company. The top two at Vanguard are most bullish on the Windsor Fund, the popular growth and income fund with $8.2 billion in assets. Daniel Wiener, editor of The Vanguard Adviser, which tracks the goings-on of Vanguard funds, went through 32 recent Vanguard proxies to determine the Vanguard funds most popular with Vanguard management and directors. Vanguard's chairman, John Bogle, has $2.2 million in Windsor, by Mr. Wiener's estimate, and Vanguard's president, John Brennan, has $907,000 there.

A Vanguard spokesman, Brian Mattes, warned that the copycat strategy can backfire, and that no one should assume that Mr. Bogle or Mr. Brennan's approach is right for others. Vanguard sued Mr. Wiener on Feb. 11, charging a trademark violation for using the word "Vanguard" in his newsletter title. A trial date has not been set. SUSAN ANTILLA

For Coffee, the Slump Goes On

RIO DE JANIERO

ALTHOUGH the average Brazilian coffee grower is tearing out bushes with both hands, large crops this year of Brazilian robusta coffee beans as well as Colombian arabicas are expected to prolong a slump in world coffee prices.

While worldwide coffee consumption is climbing slowly, thanks to Asia's newly affluent nations, per capita consumption in the United States and Brazil has been cut almost in half over the last 30 years.

In London last month, talks collapsed in the latest effort to re-establish an agreement between producing and consuming nations meant to smooth supply and pricing patterns.

Now, with prices already weak, everything depends on what producer countries do in coming months with their huge inventories. Last year, Colombia aggressively sold inventories, pushing its total export sales to a record 16.5 million sacks. This season, attention has turned to Brazil, with its coffee mountain of 17.5 million sacks.

"Sale of Government stocks in 1993 is out of the question," said Orlando Correa, president of the Coffee Trade Center, a private group that represents Brazilian exporters. "A quantitative and qualitative audit will have to be made of the inventory, and the audit will take six months."

Should Brazil indeed continue to hold stocks off the market, Colombia could well surpass Brazil in volume sales this year, snatching away a crown worn throughout this century by "King Coffee."

But since Brazilian coffee has been fetching as little as 40 cents a pound on world markets, the lowest price in inflation-adjusted terms since the early 1800's, and a far cry from the record $3.09 a pound posted in 1977, the question is whether it is worthwhile to sell. Only four years ago, prices were in the $1.15 to $1.50 range.

Prices are expected to remain depressed for another year, largely because of the large Brazilian and Colomian inventories, and because current production is close to worldwide demand. Meanwhile, while producers are stuck in the price basement, coffee roasters and retailers have resisted lowering what they charge consumers. Instead, most retailers have been pocketing greater profits.

The worst may be over for the growers, experts say, but a rebound is another matter. "Coffee is pretty much near the bottom of the commodity cycle now," said Lawrence Eagles, an analyst in London for GNI Ltd., a futures broker. "But a price shift in favor of the producer probably won't come for 18 months or two years," when the twin effects of lower prices and a shrinking crop finally lead to a shortage and a price rebound.

Here in Brazil, still the world's largest grower, the coffee outlook for now is bleak.

With production costs running almost 40 percent higher than world prices, growers have reduced the number of bushes by almost a quarter; to 3.2 billion today; from 4.2 billion in 1989, when an international agreement between coffee producers and consumers collapsed. In addition to replacing coffee bushes with orange or rubber trees, Brazilian growers have also cut back on the care of remaining coffee bushes.

"There has been inadequate crop care for three years," said Dean R. Burquist, a technical consultant to the Brazilian Federation of Coffee Exporters. "There is no question that people are investing less in coffee trees."

At the same time, Brazil's economy no longer revolves around King Coffee. In 1952, Brazil depended on coffee for 74 percent of its export revenues. Last year, Brazil's coffee exports, a total of $1.1 billion, accounted for a mere 4 percent of the total.

"Brazilian coffee cultivation lacks Government attention — credit and financing," said Oswaldo Aranha Neto, president of the coffee federation.

Late last month, a Brazilian official briefed reporters here on an $860 million plan to revive the coffee sector but no Rio newspapers carried a story about the plan, either because of a general lack of interest in coffee affairs or because of skepticism that the Government would actually deliver the money to growers.

This year, good weather is expected to swell Brazil's coffee crop about 10 percent over last year's level, hitting 24 million 132-pound sacks.

Further postponing a shortage that would lift prices off the floor, a good crop is also expected in Colombia, the world's No. 2 producer.

Colombian coffee is cossetted by by the Government in Colombia, where about 20 percent of the people now depend on the crop for their livelihood. Despite the 1989 collapse of the International Coffee Agreement, a Government subsidy program in Colombia pushed that nation's annual crop up 42 percent, to 17 million bags last year, from 12 million.

With a million jobs at stake in a violence-prone nation, Colombia's National Coffee Fund, which adminsters the Government's support program, has spent $1 billion over the four years to prop up producer prices. The subsidies and an aggressive marketing campaign enabled Colombia to expand its world market share to 22 percent today, from 14 percent in 1989.

"Now the question is: is Colombia going to keep on subsidizing?" asked Mr. Aranha. To ease the hemorrhage of subsidy money, Colombia's National Coffee Federation, which buys from the growers, has started a modest program of paying farmers to eradicate unproductive and diseased coffee plots. ■

Beating Some Unbeaten Paths

AFTER spending three weeks in Brazil, Argentina and Morocco, J. Mark Mobius, the granddaddy of emerging markets investing, touched down in New York in mid-April to begin a two-week whirlwind city-a-day tour around the United States to visit clients. Then he left for Sri Lanka, all the while planning his summer trip to Russia, Poland and Czechoslovakia.

The agenda is typical for Mr. Mobius, who spends so much time in transit, circling the globe thrice a year, that he fills up passports in 12 months and donates all his frequent-flier miles to relatives.

His insistence on seeing his investments firsthand has paid off. He is one of only a handful of managers with emerging-markets experience, and "knowing the markets, and how they function, is imperative to delivering the returns," said Don Phillips, vice president of Morningstar Inc., mutual fund researchers in Chicago.

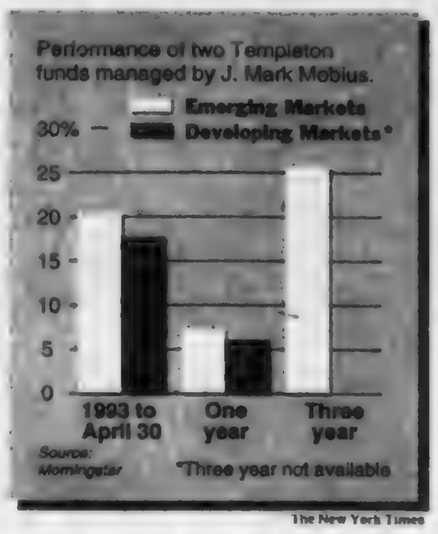
Among Mr. Mobius's $1.3 billion under management in the United States, Britain, Canada and Asia is the Templeton Emerging Markets Fund, a closed-end fund set up in 1987 that returned 28.6 percent, on average, for the five years through April 30. Meanwhile, his mutual fund set up in November 1991 to invest in the same type of stocks, Templeton Developing Markets, gained 4.3 percent from inception through April 30, Morningstar said.

Unlike mutual funds, closed-end funds issue a fixed number of shares that trade on exchanges, often at a discount or premium to the value of their holdings. Templeton Emerging Markets has been trading at a hefty premium of roughly 30 percent, which even Mr. Mobius concedes is high. He recommends investors opt instead for the mutual fund.



The New York Times

Both funds draw their 60 to 90 issues from the same list of what he considers cheap stocks in developing countries, he said. As to which fund owns what stocks, Mr. Mobius said, that depends on "accident and the market mechanism." Over time, the portfolios should begin to look the same, he said, because he holds stocks for five years or more.

By his definition, emerging markets include everything but North America, Japan, Australia, New Zealand and Europe (except Portugal, Greece and Turkey). These developed economies account for roughly 90 percent of global market capitalization.

Why his faith in emerging markets? Because 85 percent of the world's population and natural wealth reside there, compared with only 15 percent of the world's output.

"The story is hope and growth," Mr. Mobius said. "We don't subscribe to the Malthusian disaster scenario." The emerging markets, he said, are growing more rapidly than the developed markets because the populations are young, people are living longer and literacy is increasing.

Nonetheless, emerging markets investments are not for the faint of heart. Investors will be rewarded only "with patience, and there will be some burnt fingers," he said.

Mr. Mobius, a 56-year-old bachelor who has a home on Lantau Island, Hong Kong, and an apartment in Singapore, figures he spends 80 percent of his time traveling, digging up information that, he says, is simply not available otherwise. "It's easier to hold on to purchases going down in price if I see the plant and how people work and I know the management," he said.

In the markets of developing countries, where regulatory standards are loose, if they exist at all, intangibles count all the more. Thus Mr. Mobius might investigate the reputation of a family that controls a company he is interested in, which makes it "important to be on the ground."

And in many countries, inflation is so high that accounting policies require more time for interpretation.

The biggest factor pushing emerging-markets growth is privatization, said Mr. Mobius. He noted that when Argentina, for instance, began privatizing railways, water, sewer and electric systems, the budget deficit, which had been created by supporting the inefficient state enterprises, began to fall.

A long-time value investor, Mr. Mobius looks for "undervalued situations." He asks how a company will perform five years hence, based on shareholder earnings after taxes and charges. Then, too, a company must be cheap "relative to its own historical price levels, its own market and similar companies around the world." He sells shares only "when I can buy something 50 percent cheaper than what I already own." As for hedging currencies, "I don't, because over the long run, equities are a hedge."

So where does the Indiana Jones of international investing see bargains today? Right now, each fund is about 40 percent invested in the Philippines, Brazil, Turkey and Malaysia (about 10 percent in each country), with 4 to 6 percent each in Indonesia, Hong Kong, Greece and Portugal. Profit-taking over the last year reduced the funds' holdings in Thailand, Hong Kong and Argentina.

In Eastern Europe, Mr. Mobius says he is "investing in Hungary, nibbling at Poland and looking carefully at the Czech Republic."

Among his current stock favorites are Ottoman Bank in Turkey; United Plantations, a British-listed orange grower in Swaziland; Cycle and Carriage, an automobile distributor in Singapore, and Philex Mining, a copper and gold miner in the Philippines. ■

Making Executives Take a Stake

Motivating managers by having them hold company stock.

IN January, the Union Carbide Corporation implemented a program that will require top managers to hold a certain multiple of their annual salaries in company stock. "We spent a lot of time talking about how to align senior management to the overall performance of the company," said Malcolm A. Kessinger, vice president for human resources. "We think what we've done is appropriate."

Consultants say Union Carbide is at the leading edge of an emerging trend in employee compensation. Of 100 companies responding to a survey last month by Hewitt Associates, benefits consultants based in Lincolnshire, Ill., 16 reported formal stock ownership guidelines for executives, four reported informal guidelines and seven said they were considering adopting such guidelines. Hewitt and other compensation firms say they have not conducted such surveys before.

Although the top command of a company has traditionally been expected to show loyalty by owning stock, written guidelines are something new. "I've had conversations with companies about this at the compensation committee level for years," said Michael Guthman, a partner in Hewitt's Rowayton, Conn., office. "They've always said they would encourage people to own stock. But nothing was ever put in writing before. Now I think we're going to see it growing."

Gary Lyons, director of research and development at Institutional Shareholder Services Inc., a Washington research house that advises institutional investors on how to vote proxies, confirms the trend and sees it reaching further down in the ranks. "We cover about 8,000 domestic companies and 4,000 global companies and we agree that companies are requiring employees in lower salary brackets to take an ownership role," he said.

Put Your Money . . .

One company's new rules for executive investment, in shares:

C.E.O.	40,000
C.F.O.	20,000
Executive vice president/director	20,000
Treasurer	10,000
Other executive vice presidents	10,000
Other officers and vice presidents	10,000
Last executive tier	3,000

52-week price range: $45-67 a share.

Source: Hewitt Associates

The motivation for management is clear: Many companies have come under attack for paying their executives too much.

Companies have argued that their stock option programs are a way to foster executive ownership of stock, to tie the executive's welfare to the company's welfare. But many executives simply exercise their options, sell the stock and pocket the profit.

"Through the last season or two, stock options have been functioning as a proxy for cash compensation," Mr. Guthman said.

That was part of the rationale behind Union Carbide's decision. "Stock options are supposed to be motivational, but they are just paper until you convert them," Mr. Kessinger said. "If you have the money invested in the stock itself, there is a downside as well as an upside potential. That gets your attention a little more."

Although consultants applaud the trend as a responsible move by company management, they acknowledge that executives who are required to hold the stock may not be too happy about it. "For those people who do not own any stock and are now told they must have three times their salary in stock, they are not going to like it," Mr. Guthman said.

Further, many of the companies surveyed by Hewitt extended the stock ownership requirement far beyond top management. For example, some require all vice presidents to hold a certain amount of stock. One company defined those who must hold stock as anyone in a position earning $50,000 a year or more.

At Union Carbide, 14 executives with salaries ranging from $150,000 to $850,000 will be required to hold stock. The chief executive officer must hold four times his annual salary in stock; the chief operating officer must hold three times his salary. The others must hold stock equal to their salaries. Each has five years from last Jan. 26 to reach that goal; no corporate financial assistance is given.

For many of them, it will require significant purchases of stock. "Right now those people have between 25 percent and 100 percent of the target," Mr. Kessinger said. But, he added, "their accounts have increased by at least 25 percent" since January.

Union Carbide has considered requiring lower-level executives to hold stock. "That's a thought that comes across our mind," Mr. Kessinger said. But so far, it has not acted on the thought.

Mr. Lyons said he is not certain that requiring executives at lower levels to hold stock will accomplish the desired effect. His company conducted a research project last year with professors at the University of Pennsylvania. It found that tying too large a portion of executives' discretionary income to one company may make them risk-averse.

"If the executive is not diversified, if too much of his compensation is variable and tied to one company, he may not be willing to take enough risk in the market," Mr. Lyons said. "He may become conservative and obsolete and not want to grow the company."

One place that will probably ignore the new stock ownership requirement is Silicon Valley. The culture of the technology companies there is tied to the ability to make it big by cashing in stock options. "In the garage startup days, all you had was stock options," said Andy West, compensation practice leader for the Wyatt Company in San Francisco. "Every bit of cash you had you were plowing back into the business."

Now many of the companies are maturing. They offer the whole range of benefits. But the idea of getting rich by cashing in your stock options "is really dying hard," Mr. West said. "Options are used as cash. If you're going to start pushing people to own stock, you have to start by setting an example at the top of the house. That hasn't happened yet." ■

Too Many Eggs in One Basket?

MANY financial planners advise employees to invest their assets outside their own company to achieve better diversification. They argue that if you have your paycheck, your pension and your portfolio all tied to the same company, you are in a very high-risk position.

In fact, companies that offer financial counseling to senior executives find that the planners typically advise executives to sell their company stock and diversify.

The new rule on mandatory holdings of company stock, then, "clearly flies in the face of that advice," said Michael Guthman, partner at Hewitt Associates. "In one company, where they use a single financial planner, the company told him: 'Don't go around telling people to diversify any more.' "

Others voice similar concerns. "Suppose I.B.M. had had a stock ownership requirement a year ago," said Harold Evensky, a financial planner in Coral Gables, Fla. "It certainly would have affected the future standard of living of many of these people."

Although he agrees that top executives should be required to hold stock, Mr. Evensky argues that a middle-level executive "is taking substantially more risk than makes sense." Naturally, if your company requires that you hold the stock, "you have to do it," he said. "But you should discount the value of what they're paying you."

Mutual Fund Tables Explained

Because of the complexity of mutual fund commissions, dividends and fees, the Associated Press uses a system of footnotes with the fund listings. They are: E—Ex-capital gains distribution. S—Stock dividend or split. X—Ex-cash dividend. F—Previous day's quotation. (NL)n—No front-end load or contingent deferred sales load. P—Fund assets are used to pay for distribution costs — 12(b)1 plan. R—Redemption fee or contingent deferred sales load may apply. T—Both P and R apply.

The Executive Life/Anne Thompson

Kids Are Changing Hollywood's Ways

Day care, flextime and lots of hired help ease the way for the powerful in film.

LOS ANGELES

WHEN Joe Roth left as chairman of Twentieth Century-Fox in November to sign an independent production pact at Disney, he explained: "This was a life-style change. I wanted to coach my son's soccer team without guilt."

Mr. Roth isn't the first Hollywood executive to jump out of the fast lane in good part for the sake of his family, but he is one of an increasing number for whom having a child has reshaped work habits and even business decisions (like making more family-oriented movies). The demands of the high-powered Hollywood scene, these executive parents discover, have made the family/career balancing act especially challenging, but the discovery has also prompted some creative workplace arrangements.

"So many more of the people in power positions have young children," observed Lucy Fisher, Warner Brothers executive vice president in charge of worldwide production, "that they can relate to working parents."

When Judy Hofflund, a partner at the International Agency (Laura Dern, Cybill Shepherd, Isabella Rossellini), was being wooed to take her team to United Talent Agency, she agreed to move only if she and her colleague, J.J. Harris, could recreate their office nursery for their two children and their nannies. They won.

"I work more intense hours than most," says Ms. Hofflund. "All my energy goes into work and Rosemary. My attitude is — where I go, she goes. Before she was 1, she had already been to Prague, Cannes, New York five times, London and Wales, not to mention short hops to North Carolina and Arizona."

Debra Solomon

Rachel Pfeffer joined Castle Rock Entertainment as a senior vice president of production because the management team accepted the 10-to-6:30 work day that allowed her to spend more time with her young daughter.

"There's still so much deep wariness about working mothers," says Ms. Pfeffer, who hires a day-time babysitter. "I don't think other people have as much control as I did. I just stayed up later, and got up earlier."

The independent producer Dawn Steel ("Sister Act") is writing a Hollywood primer for up-and-coming female executives titled "They Can Kill You But They Can't Eat You." In 1987, when she was production president at Paramount and in the hospital delivering her daughter, her boss diluted her power by hiring an executive who would report directly to him instead of to her. She negotiated out of her Paramount contract and, her baby daughter in tow and her husband on location in Australia, went on to become chairman of Columbia Pictures.

"My new bosses helped me find the support system I needed, which included a full-time nanny," recalled Ms. Steel. "Rebecca was with me in the nursery next to my office a lot. That was the end of breakfast meetings for me."

With almost 12 years at Warner, Lucy Fisher negotiated a work schedule that allows her to work at home on Mondays and Fridays with her three children. The price she has been willing to pay has been to watch one man after another move past her through the production president slot.

But Ms. Fisher actually considers one of her most significant achievements to be the Warner Bros. Day Care Center, which she proposed and pushed to completion. The center opened in November, and now studio parents can leave their 3-month to 5-year-old children there from 7 A.M. to 7 P.M. "I'm as proud of this as anything I've ever done," said Ms. Fisher. "Secretaries can work instead of having to quit their jobs, and the kids are really happy."

Paramount has run a day care center since 1986. After an eight-year push by Bette Midler's All-Girl Productions, Disney too is building a day care center in Burbank, and Sony, owner of Columbia Pictures, has a day care center in the planning stage.

"It's a good thing," said Columbia's chairman, Mark Canton, who can afford full-time live-in help so that he and his wife, the producer Wendy Finerman, can keep up their rigorous work schedules. "We have to make a real effort to make our kids our first priority," he said. "We start together with breakfast. One or the other takes the kids to school. Wendy goes home early and does work from home. No matter what our evening social or business agenda is, I go home and read the kids a story and put them to bed before going back out. Weekends are really for the kids."

Mr. Canton says he now wants to make more family films. "When you become a family, you see how kids respond to movies from a young age," he says. "I'm more conscious of the fact that we live in a violent world and I'm trying to be responsible."

David Vogel, executive vice president of Disney Pictures, last year hired Mireille Soria as production vice president in part because she was a mother, making her the only mother among Disney's creative executives.

Bumble Ward recently joined Clein + White Public Relations partly because Harry Clein told her that it was fine if she wanted to have another child. "I've hardly ever used having a child as an excuse," she says. "On the whole people are not cool with it, even when they say they are."

Linda Lichter, an entertainment attorney, has met the challenge of having three children by hiring a lot of help. During each of her babies' first 11 months, she had the child near the office for nursing. She and her husband — neither of whom do any domestic work — have rotating help at home, one person from 7:30 A.M. to 3:30 P.M., another from 3:30 P.M. to 9:30 P.M. and a third on the weekends.

"We've created an extended family, not a nuclear family," she said, "so the kids are not so totally dependent on us. I talk to the kids about current events; he plays with model trains. We're both daddies." ■

In therapy with a computer: Olga Egbert, a Pacific Bell employee, at the Gould Center in Burbank, Calif.

At Work/Kathleen Murray

When the Therapist Is a Computer

Employers offer stressed-out workers a novel way to work through problems.

HARDLY a moment was wasted the day Olga Egbert started therapy. Just minutes after the Pacific Bell employee entered the office and sat down, it seemed, she was fielding the first question: In which areas of your life do you feel the most stress?

Ms. Egbert, 43 years old, thought hard for a minute. Her teen-age son's drug problem and the tension at home. The crying jags. Her increasing inability to concentrate at work. Yes, she decided, it was time to tell someone about them. Looking straight into the computer screen she began to type.

It may sound farfetched. But computerized psychotherapy is here and, to the dismay of some psychiatrists, could soon be coming to a company near you. In the latest attempt to make a timeworn remedy more user friendly — and pare corporate mental health care costs in the process — dozens of employers including the Walt Disney Company and Beatrice Hunt Wesson, as well as Pacific Bell, are offering stressed-out employees a chance to go on-line with their problems.

It's all part of corporate America's search for a method of assisting emotionally troubled employees that both works and is cost-effective. Employers now pay an average of $245 a year per employee for mental health care, according to a survey by the Wyatt Company, benefits consultants. More troubling, some studies indicate most of this money is spent on a minority of employees in long-term therapy.

"Companies can no longer afford to foot the bill for tea-and-sympathy patients who are just dependent on their therapists," said Dr. H. G. Whittington, medical director of Managed Health Network in Los Angeles, which began providing computer-assisted counseling to a number of its 350 corporate clients just over a year ago.

The computer program used by Ms. Egbert was created by Dr. Roger Gould, a clinical psychiatrist at the University of California at Los Angeles who runs a counseling center for corporate clients. Designed so people won't be in therapy forever, the program is set up to be completed in 10 sessions at a cost of $600 to $800 dollars. "People using it tend to get to the issues more quickly," Dr. Gould said. "And most people find the computer less threatening."

To the uninitiated or the truly reluctant employee, the process might seem more akin to interacting with a self-help book than to baring one's soul. Employees who seek help through their company employee assistance program may be confidentially referred to one of seven Gould centers in the Los Angeles area. After a brief consultation with a therapist, first-time clients are escorted to a private room. A disk is slipped into a computer and the questions begin.

There is little room for the time-consuming digressions that can run up bills in traditional therapy. The computer asks what is causing the stress, then offers participants a list that includes everything from loneliness to not getting what they want out of life. Or the participant can type in a response. Each response triggers a series of additional questions from the computer. If a person says he is unhappy with his work, for example, the computer might next ask whether he feels he's being pressured or is not getting enough support. If he answers yes, he'll be asked how that makes him feel. Weighted down?

At the end of the 40-minute session the computer will offer the patient a diagnosis based on his responses, and suggest the area to be worked on. The employee's human therapist gets a printout that flags danger signs — suicidal tendencies or depression. The patient's responses are supposed to remain confidential.

SUBSEQUENT sessions will force the employee to narrow the list of concerns and focus on one area to change.

"What often happens in traditional therapy is that you tell stories about your life and have someone listen, which feels good, but may not make you any better," Dr. Gould said. Working on the computer first, he added, helps identify issues on which a therapist can later focus.

People will talk to the computer, he said, "about incest, abuse — because there's no shame when you're just hitting a button. The same information would take therapists a number of sessions to get."

Some of Dr. Gould's peers in the psychiatric profession are less enthusiastic. "I think it could be very dangerous," said Dr. Harvey Ruben, a professor of clinical psychiatry at Yale University, who worries that the process is too impersonal. "It might be good for information gathering, but I wouldn't use it for everyone."

BUT Dr. Gould said his therapists are carefully trained in using the program and are aware of its limitations. The computer is only utilized in conjunction with face-to-face counseling — as a way to initiate discussion, he added. It works best in resolving stress-related work and family problems.

The Gould Center doesn't use the computer system to treat alcoholics or individuals on medication for depression. And because people are most likely to seek professional help when they are in crisis, care is also taken to insure that someone is emotionally ready for insights that the computer might generate.

It may cut costs. It may be less threatening. It may not work.

Employee response has been largely positive. Managed Health Network said nearly three-quarters of the employees they serve indicated they preferred the computer to traditional counseling methods.

After completing her 10-week session, Ms. Egbert came to terms with her family problems and found her stress at work diminished. "I've never moved along so quickly," she said. Others are less comfortable with the technology. Some patients choose to bypass the computer. Hewlett-Packard also rejected the idea. Spokeswoman Michelle Drake was quick to say the computer firm would "only send our people to real therapists."

For their part, counselors don't appear threatened. "If people could heal themselves, they wouldn't be in therapy," said Dr. Bert Pepper, a professor of clinical psychiatry at New York University. "What makes any therapy work is the relationship with another person." ■

Low-Tech Medicine

To the Editor:

Fazlur Rahman, in "Let's Hear It for Low-Tech Medicine" (Viewpoints, April 18), has rounded up many of the usual suspects — high-tech procedures, defensive medicine, specialists. But some of those suspects may have genuine alibis.

High-tech care: The use of high-tech tests such as CT scanning has obviated the need for other more dangerous exams, surgeries and countless follow-up visits. It is the outrageous charges for (not costs of) high-tech tests that are indefensible.

Defensive medicine: The problem is that even medical experts have trouble agreeing on what it actually is. (What's defensive medicine to one doctor is often appropriate care to another.) Most of the published cost figures, then, exist primarily to bolster self-serving arguments.

Shortages of internists: Dr. Rahman claims that internists are a badly needed link between family physicians and specialists. An alternative interpretation is that, while this may once have been true, today they are often an unnecessary and expensive extra step in the referral process. And the Clinton Administration's push for more primary care should mean we will require fewer, rather than more, internists.

CORY FRANKLIN
Chicago, April 20

The author is an internist at Cook County Hospital.

To the Editor:

I concur with Dr. Rahman's criticisms of the limitations of the Health Care Task Force with its current membership. I am puzzled, though, by his omission of nurses from a list of those who should be included on this team. As the largest group of direct providers of health care, nurses must be represented.

STEPHANIE SIMPSON, R.N./C.R.R.N.
Bridgeport, Conn., April 24

To the Editor:

The article is partly outdated. In the last five years, the entire Medicare payment system has been restructured to reduce payments to specialists and increase payments to primary care/general internists. Payments for procedures performed by gastroenterologists, for example, have dropped by an average of 51.3 percent since 1987. Medical education funding has been modified to increase incentives to encourage more physicians to choose primary care.

In today's medicine, technological advances save lives. Ulcer patients who in 1965 were treated with a bland diet and faced eventual surgery may now be treated medically, and return to work and active lives. As President Reagan's case demonstrated, cancer growths are detected and removed without in-patient hospitalization and before the disease advances to a lethal stage.

Instead of condemning technology we need to blend it with compassion. The most important resource in our health care system is the physician who recognizes that "the secret in the care of the patient is in caring for the patient."

LAWRENCE J. BRANDT, M.D.
Bronx, New York, April 28

The author is president of the American College of Gastroenterology.

Bosnia's Serbs Smirk, and Keep Shooting

By ELAINE SCIOLINO

WASHINGTON

WITH the American decision to press the Serbs to make peace in Bosnia, and the defiant rejection of that initiative by the renegade Bosnian Serb parliament last week, all sides are now staring down an unmarked road in the Balkans that they fear may be the pathway to hell.

The decision by the Serb legislators, meeting at the Heavenly Valley Hotel in the ski resort of Pale, was followed by reports that the Serbs had moved on Zepa, one of only two remaining Muslim enclaves in eastern Bosnia. This seemed to mock the intense diplomatic cajoling by the world's most powerful nations, testing their will and making it harder than ever to evade a somber choice: military intervention to force the Bosnian Serbs to end their aggression.

And yet, for a week now, all sides seem also to have been moving around each other in circles, as if they still have time for last-minute maneuvers that may yet keep the Balkan war from escalating. The Americans and Europeans found new ways last week to quibble over just what strategy to use. The Serbs in Belgrade found new ways to say they want their brethren in Bosnia to stop the slaughter, without actually restraining them. And the Serbs in Bosnia found new ways to persuade the credulous that maybe there is hope that they will finally opt for peace — next week, of course, not now, while Muslim enclaves still lie open for conquest.

Secretary of State Warren Christopher, right, with Prime Minister Édouard Balladur of France in Paris last week during consultations about Bosnia.

The vote in Pale reverberated in the Oval Office, where President Clinton challenged the Europeans to join him "quickly and decisively" in "tougher measures" against the Bosnian Serbs. "Their savage and cynical ethnic cleansing offends the world's conscience and our standards of behavior," he said. And the polls began to shift slightly, indicating that if the American people do not yet hunger for military intervention, at least they have the beginnings of a stomach for it.

To many, the speech sounded as if Mr. Clinton had thrown down a gauntlet. What was perhaps most significant was not what he said, but that he said it himself, no longer relegating the task of articulating the Bosnia policy to his Secretary of State.

But the speech was less a call to war than a warning siren. A reluctant warrior, Mr. Clinton is committed to taking limited military action based less on strict military doctrine than on what Americans — and their European allies — will tolerate. When he said America "is ready to do its part," he meant only if Europe does its part too. And he did not mean sending American soldiers to fight; he would rather send arms to the beleaguered Bosnian Government and launch air strikes to paralyze the Serbs until the arms arrive.

But this approach has left him a conundrum. He says he cannot lead if Europe won't follow. But the Europeans say they can't follow unless Mr. Clinton tells them what to do. And when he has laid out a course — arming the Bosnians, for example — the Europeans have felt free to say it is not the right course after all.

Instead of a take-it-or-leave-it American plan of action, Mr. Christopher last week brought what he called the President's "direction"; he said it was on the table not only for discussion but also for amendment. This put the Europeans in the unusual position of facing him as equal partners, with a chance to float ideas of their own and thus, once more, avoid a decision entirely.

Because Mr. Clinton ordered his envoy not to disclose details of the policy "direction," there was also no opportunity to sell the plan via the American public, and the Europeans filled the void by picking it apart. Thus, the week that began with warnings of impending military action quickly turned toward academic debate about the merits of various options — hardly enough to scare the recalcitrant Bosnian Serb parliament into submission when it met at mid-week in the smoke-filled conference room in Pale.

Emboldened by the lack of a clear American focus,

Monthly Surveys Mask a Deep Gloom

Three Decades of Dwindling Hope for Prosperity

By LOUIS UCHITELLE

CONSUMER confidence. It has such a reassuring, solid sound. If only it would come back, the economy surely would get better. It was even up a bit in April, the poll takers reported recently, although not nearly as much as last December when hopes were so high for the newly elected President.

But such avid attention to the monthly fluctuations has concealed a most troubling trend. Ever since the 1960's, the optimism of Americans about the economy and their own circumstances has gradually deteriorated. And today millions of people view their future with no sense of certainty that things can get better.

Put starkly, the soaring optimism of the 1950's and 1960's that life in America could only become more prosperous has gradually given way to what Richard T. Curtin, director of consumer surveys at the University of Michigan, calls "diminished expectations." The 1970's and early 1980's — a transition period — brought fist-banging and frustration as living standards stopped rising for most Americans. And now, particularly over the past three years, the struggle to regain the old prosperity has dissolved into resignation.

"People are satisfied today if they can keep their incomes and living standards from declining," Mr. Curtin said. Other poll takers have picked up the same shift in attitudes, among them the Daniel Yankelovich Group, a market-research firm. "Happiness is being able to cut it with less," said Florence Skelly, the firm's vice chairman. "Rather than trying to climb the economic ladder, people are becoming more concerned with relationships and family and community involvement."

The phenomenon is still too new to trace all its consequences, says Christopher Jencks, a sociologist at Northwestern University. But some are becoming very evident. Above all, Americans, having lost the old confidence that next year will bring a higher wage or a better job, have been unexpectedly reluctant to help turn the weak national economy into a stronger one. As interest

Millions at Risk

Scientists Identify A Gene That Causes Colon Cancer and Others

In a medical double whammy, scientists have identified a gene, carried by 1 in 200 people, that causes colon cancer and other cancers, and they have discovered an astonishing way it leads to tumors.

Millions of Americans are at risk of carrying the gene, and anyone who does runs a 90 to 100 percent chance of developing cancer. About 65 percent will develop colon cancer. The rest will contract cancer of the uterus or ovary, if they are women, or cancer of the stomach, small intestine, gall bladder, kidney, urethra or pancreas.

The researchers who located the gene, Dr. Bert Vogelstein of Johns Hopkins University School of Medicine in Baltimore and Dr. Albert de la Chapelle of the University of Helsinki in Finland, estimate that at least 13 percent of all colon cancers are caused by the gene. The American Cancer Society predicts that the cancer will be diagnosed in 152,000 Americans this year and that 57,000 will die.

The gene does not cause the disease directly but seems to work by eliciting hundreds of thousands of mutations in other genes. Eventually, researchers theorize, some of these mutations turn cells cancerous. How this new gene operates contrasts sharply with other cancer genes, which remove brakes on cell division, enabling cells to proliferate wildly.

The discovery, reported last week in Science magazine, is expected to lead to a test identifying people with the gene. But such a test will not be available for a few years, researchers said.

"There are literally millions of Americans with a family history of colon or uterine cancer," Dr. Vogelstein said. "It will cause a logistical problem — dealing with so many families and people and how to institute testing that is scientifically sound."

There is as yet no way to prevent cancer in those with the gene, but people can have frequent tests to detect the illness at an early stage. GINA KOLATA

The American Family Revalued

Contrary to prevailing notions that Americans care little about their parents, recent research finds that the majority of Americans are in close-knit families whose members stay in touch and take care of each other.

An exhaustive new study by Dr. Thomas Juster of the University of Michigan, conducted for the National Institute on Aging, is also supported by a survey for the American Association of Retired Persons. Together with other data, said Dr. Beth Soldo of Georgetown University in Washington, who worked with Dr. Juster, they show emphatically that "the family ties are there." The studies show that most middle-aged Americans give time, caring for their elderly parents and grown children, as well as money, supporting them if necessary.

Many Americans are also not as scattered as previously thought, according to Robert Harootyan, who directed the study for the A.A.R.P. At least 60 percent of people aged 18 and over who had living parents either lived with them or lived within an hour's drive of them.

And Dr. Richard Suzman, director of the office of demography at the National Institute on Aging, said a previous study by the National Center for Health Statistics showed that people aged 80 and older were in more or less constant contact with their children. GINA KOLATA

South African Whites Demand Their Own Bantustan

Leaders of most of South Africa's white separatist groups formed the Afrikaner People's Front last week to demand that a homeland be carved from the northeastern province of Transvaal as a refuge for those sharing their language and views. At a rally, above, 5,000 farmers vowed to fight rather than live under an African National Congress Government.

Lani Guinier's Agenda Provokes Old Enemies

Associated Press

Guinier

After being introduced to the press as President Clinton's choice to head the Justice Department's civil rights division, Lani Guinier made it clear she felt the Government's civil rights agenda had been trashed by 12 years of Republican White House rule.

Asked who was responsible for much of the damage, she spat out the name: "William Bradford Reynolds." Mr. Reynolds was point man for the Reagan Administration's counter-revolution on civil rights. The retrenchment was suffused with a political calculation that many white Americans, seething over issues like affirmative action, thought things had gone too far.

Ms. Guinier, a 43-year-old law professor at the University of Pennsylvania who served in the civil rights division under Jimmy Carter, is poised to lead a counter-counter-revolution. Her admirers regard Ms. Guinier as tough and brilliant.

But conservative interest groups, including the Judicial Selection Monitoring Project, an umbrella group, see her nomination as a chance to test their strength against the President. The weapon they would use is her scholarly writings about the Voting Rights Act in which she argues that the law's guarantee that blacks have an opportunity to elect blacks is not enough. Black lawmakers can still be outvoted, and Ms. Guinier has discussed weighted voting schemes to make white lawmakers on all levels of government more sensitive to minority issues.

These groups say she is a radical whose impatience with "one-person, one-vote" can be used to make her unacceptable to most Americans. NEIL A. LEWIS

Turmoil in Sri Lanka

Fear for the Future Follows an Assassination

With the cremation last week of the body of Sri Lanka's assassinated President, Ranasignhe Premadasa, this island looked to the future with anxiety.

Despite Mr. Premadasa's efforts to quarantine the 10-year-old civil war being waged in the north and the east by a guerrilla army of the Tamil minority, he himself became the victim of their terror in a suicide bombing last weekend. There had been broad unhappiness with aspects of his rule.

Parliament turned to the country's Prime Minister, Dingiri Banda Wijetunga, as the new President. A man who has neither professed great political ambition nor displayed great initiative, Mr. Wijetunga, a devout upper-caste Buddhist, called on the nation to overcome its addiction to violence and intolerance. He also strove to blunt an early challenge from the former President's widow, Hema Premadasa, who announced on the day of the funeral that she intended to take up her husband's unfinished work. *EDWARD A. Workers Kill Workers

Yet Again, Violence In the Post Office

The coincidence was bizarre, but the events were disturbingly familiar. On Thursday, in both Michigan and California, disgruntled postal workers brought guns to work and shot their colleagues. Two of the victims died, one of the gunmen killed himself and the other fled into hiding.

Each case had its own twists. The gunman in Dearborn, Mich., a postal mechanic who had threatened co-workers in the past, was distraught at being passed over for a promotion. The man, Larry Jason, 45, opened fire with a handgun and a shotgun, killing one man and wounding two people before taking his own life.

The gunman in Dana Point, Calif., had been fired because of psychiatric problems that included threats to a female coworker with whom he had become obsessed. After he apparently stabbed his mother and her dog to death at her home, Mark Hilbun, 38, went to the post office, where he killed one man and wounded another.

These were just the latest in a decade-long string of 12 similar incidents at post offices that have cost the lives of 29 people and raised serious questions about conditions for the Government's largest workforce. A Congressional committee has found that the Postal Service's 750,000 employees work under a combination of high stress and a "paramilitary style of management." And it urged tougher employment screening procedures to weed out unstable people. SETH MYDANS

Terror in Cambodia

Khmer Rouge Campaign To Sabotage Elections

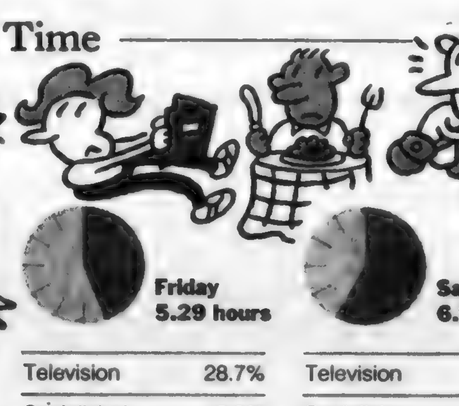
What had long been feared in Cambodia, a Khmer Rouge campaign of terror to destabilize the nation in the weeks leading to a major election, has begun.

The Maoist rebels, determined to sabotage the United Nations-supervised election beginning May 23, launched attacks throughout the country aimed at convincing Cambodians that they will risk their lives if they vote.

Their attacks are also directed at persuading the blue-bereted peacekeepers of the United Nations to go home. After a Japanese peacekeeper was killed in an ambush in northwestern Cambodia, Japanese politicians suggested that Japan's peacekeeping contingent should pull out, or at least seek less hazardous duty. Of 430 foreigners who volunteered to serve as United Nations poll workers during the election, more than 50 have quit out of fear.

The Khmer Rouge, responsible for the deaths of more than one million Cambodians in the 1970's, have reason to dread the election results. If the voting is conducted fairly, Cambodia will for the first time in a generation have a Government considered legitimate by most of the outside world. And diplomats say that such a Government would find ready foreign aid for the weaponry needed to finish off the Khmer Rouge once and for all. PHILIP SHENON

Astronomers Rage Against the Light



Nurit Karlin

Calif., which has led the world in observational astronomy since the late 1940's. In 1984, San Diego, some 40 miles away, acceded to astronomers' pleas and replaced its white street lights with low-pressure sodium lamps. Astronomers love the pure yellow light because it is easily filtered from their instruments. But San Diego residents believe it aids thieves (though there is no proof of this).

The San Diego City Council, hoping to revive its downtown, is moving to replace its lighting with a lamp that could seriously degrade deep-space observations from Palomar.

Meanwhile, a Georgia company, Space Marketing, has announced plans to put a one-mile-wide reflective panel into space some time in 1996. Ostensibly a platform for scientific instruments, this satellite, which would appear nearly as large as the full moon, would carry a commercial message or symbol visible from the ground.

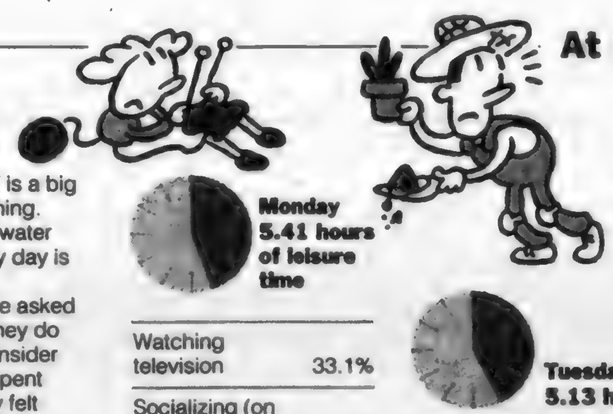
"The time may not be distant," said one anguished astronomer, "when we'll have to move to the far side of the moon if astronomy is to survive." MALCOLM W. BROWNE

For the past century astronomers have waged an unequal battle against the mounting glare of electric lighting across night skies — a smog of light pollution that renders faint galaxies all but invisible.

Two of the latest threats to astronomy stem from America's faltering economy and a widespread fear of crime.

One potential victim is the mighty 200-inch telescope on Mount Palomar,

At Leisure: Americans' Use of Down Time



THURSDAY is a big day for fishing. Sunday is water skiing day. Every day is television day.

Americans were asked to explain what they do with time they consider their own. Time spent doing things they felt obliged to do — jobs, sleep, commuting, child care, cooking, household chores, etc. — was not included. (However, some said they cooked, shopped or did yard work for fun.)

Only activities taking at least one percent of leisure time are shown. Others that were named — including sex, and collecting barbed wire — did not meet that standard.

The percentages shown are for time spent on each activity, not number of people who do it.

A Badge Is Less a Shield When Police Go Too Far

Henrik Drescher

By JOSEPH BERGER

THE image of police forces has been badly tarnished in recent months.

There was, of course, the conviction of two officers for the beating in Los Angeles of Rodney King. And in other cases around the country, including a flurry in New York State, the fundamental role of police officers as keepers of the peace has been distorted. Officers have been accused of misconduct ranging from manufacturing evidence to killing civilians carelessly.

Police experts said the focus on these cases is as much a reflection of a change in public attitudes as it is about flaws in recruiting, training or supervision. Americans, they said, are no longer automatically justifying or shrugging off police misconduct or prejudice.

Four New York State troopers admitted that in two dozen criminal cases they photocopied fingerprints from arrest records and submitted them as crime-scene evidence. Two Yonkers, N.Y., officers were dismissed for inventing an assault on a policeman by an imaginary black man to cover up a fistfight between two of their own. Last week, another two officers from Yonkers were indicted by a Federal grand jury on charges of beating two Irish immigrants with nightsticks while arresting them after a late-night christening party.

In Mount Vernon, N.Y., a doctor who fled from undercover detectives he apparently thought were muggers was shot to death, leading to the indictment of a detective on manslaughter charges. On Manhattan's West Side, a woman taken hostage by a bank robber was killed in a volley of police fire.

A generation ago, said Patrick S. Donaldson of Portland, Ore., president of the National Association of Citizens Crime Commissions, Americans tolerated police corruption and brutality with the metaphor of the "thin blue line," which he said meant "I'm not going to be too much of a critic because they are what stands between me and anarchy in this community."

A blind eye was customarily turned toward rough treatment of suspects, concoction of evidence to put away hardened criminals or payoffs from prostitution or gambling houses. Thomas A. Reppetto, president of the Citizens Crime Commission in New York City, recalled that Fiorello LaGuardia's Police Commissioner, Lewis Valentine, once tongue-whipped officers who arrested a suspected murderer "without mussing him up." In movies from the 1950's, he added, "Hollywood stars portrayed good cops who routinely used force."

But the wave of distrust of the authorities that followed the upheavals of the 1960's and the Watergate scandals did not spare the police. The Knapp Commission that investigated New York City police corruption revealed in 1972 how plainclothes officers and their supervisors systematically collected monthly payoffs from gambling dens. District attorneys who once conspired to squelch accusations of police misconduct began to find it politically shrewd to prosecute.

'The thin blue line' no longer works as an excuse to overlook cases of beatings, evidence-tampering and manslaughter by officers.

The number of police review boards and citizen watchdog groups has increased, drawing not just liberal activists but business leaders concerned about the value they get for snowballing police costs. Since 1980, Portland, Miami, San Diego and Forth Worth have started citizen watchdog groups.

Portland's, founded by its chamber of commerce, has led a review of an incident last year in which a 12-year-old boy was shot dead by officers when he was taken hostage by a deranged intruder. That case has already generated new rules on when to shoot and training on dealing with the mentally ill.

Still, not everyone agrees that the training and management issues that were the focus in Portland are at fault elsewhere. And statistics cannot always pinpoint problems. Lawrence W. Sherman, a criminologist at the University of Maryland, said that few departments even keep figures on fabrication of evidence or brutality. One of the few revealing studies shows that the number of officers killed and the number of civilians killed by urban police departments have dropped by half since the early 1970's, suggesting that more are learning restraint.

Hubert Williams, president of the Police Foundation, a Washington-based organization that advises police departments, said recruiters need to screen applicants more carefully for "short fuses," and at the same time seek out those with the "savvy, cunning and humor" to quiet volatile situations. Tests might also detect greedy or overzealous candidates.

But Mr. Williams acknowledged that psychological tests are not yet sophisticated enough to do fine sorting. And while most departments have made strides in teaching recruits the law and when to draw guns and clubs, that training may be undermined on the beats when veterans tell rookies to "forget everything they taught you up there."

Mr. Donaldson and others believe that too many cities, in their rush to flood the streets with officers in response to high-profile crimes, start skimping on training and background investigations of rookies. Such haste can backfire, he said. An ill-trained officer, through rough behavior, might provoke the young person most likely to retaliate by committing another crime.

Hasty recruiting, like the kind some critics think New York City is using in its Safe Streets program, also attracts younger officers who have not developed the older person's "tragic sense that there is bad and good in all people," said Mr. Sherman. "Young cops get into trouble more than older cops."

Simply putting more foot soldiers on the streets also dilutes the ranks of managers needed to keep tabs on corruption and brutality. In the wake of the Knapp exposé, the department asked some recruits to work undercover in station houses, quietly reporting on corruption among their fellows. But those controls, Mr. Sherman said, dissipated with rank-and-file resistance. Now New York City is going through another round of corruption inquiries.

Yet even if reform produced a friendlier, less venal force, the police might still have a difficult time resurrecting the once-gleaming honor of their badges. "Police are better trained than they've ever been," said Mr. Reppetto, "but the expectations are greater, too."

30 Years of Dwindling Hope for Prosperity

rates fell last year, for example, many economists thought that homeowners would refinance mortgages to lower their monthly payments. They did refinance, but the savings were not spent on consumer goods. They have gone mostly to pay down debt, to clear the family balance sheet, in case a wage earner is laid off or is forced to take a lower-paying job. Such bad luck, so alien to the 1950's and 1960's, so resisted in the 1970's, is accepted today as anyone's possible fate — in an age of diminished expectations.

"People were more comfortable with debt in more optimistic times," said William Dudley, a senior economist at Goldman, Sachs & Company.

Until well into the 1980's, there had been a safety valve. Women entering the work force added a second paycheck for millions of households, and that helped mask the fact that the median individual wage had failed since the early 1970's to keep up with inflation.

"The number of persons per paycheck shrank, but that is gone now," said Frank Levy, an economist at the Massachusetts Institute of Technology. "Part of it is that women's labor force participation has leveled off, and some of it is that the birth rate has kicked up as couples who had put off having children finally took the step."

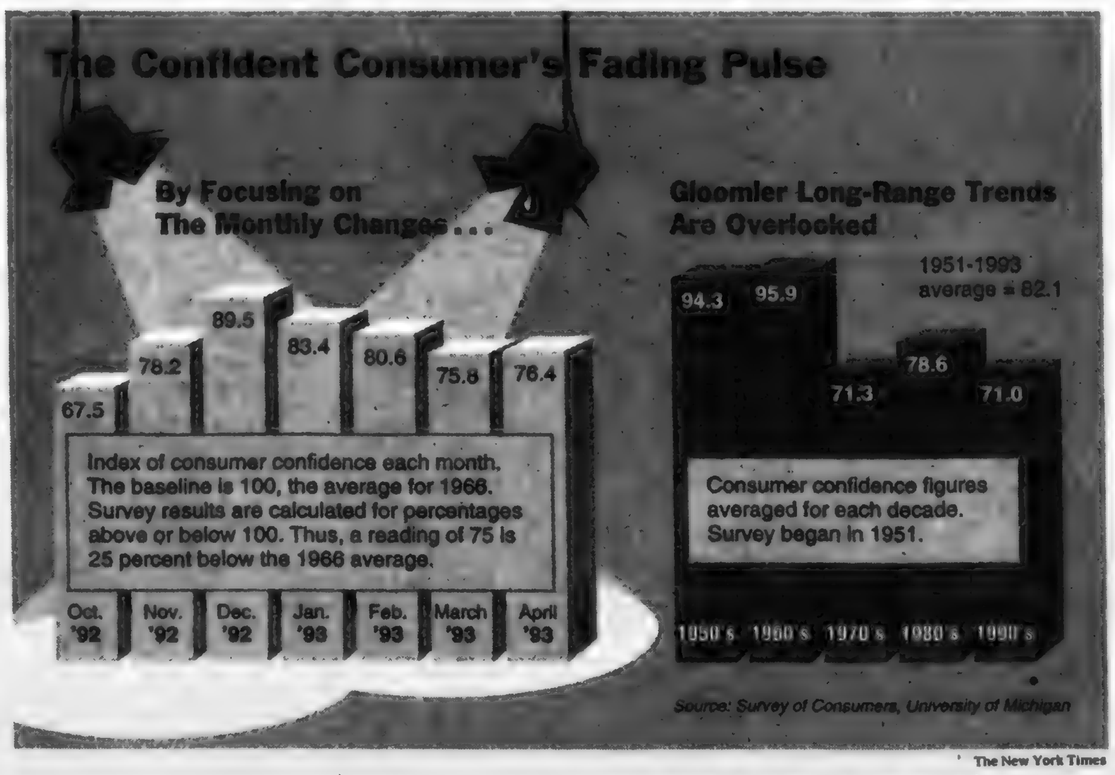
Adjusting to the change, retailers are endlessly offering bargain prices, opening more discount stores and pushing what they call real value. The new ethic is that less is more, Ms. Skelly said. "You don't need 100 shirts, 15 are fine, and you don't need designer watches and Mercedes-Benzes."

Manufacturers hesitate to step up production, despite signs of better times, and for many chief executives layoffs have become more natural than hiring. "A gradual erosion of profit margins has seriously undermined business optimism," said Jerry Jasinowski, president of the National Association of Manufacturers.

Starting Their Own Companies

But new companies — small ones — are being set up in record numbers, and William Dennis, research director for the National Federation of Independent Business, ties this trend to the diminished American mood. "A good employee says to himself, 'I am not sure of my future with this company,' so he joins with a colleague or two and they start their own business," Mr. Dennis said.

More difficult to fathom is the evolving attitude toward government. Gone is the old faith that government spending programs enhanced prosperity. "The demand for action to deal with some issue and the expectation of success have given way to a resigned pessimism that government is not likely to make things better," said Thomas E. Mann, director of governmental studies at the Brookings Institution. The budget deficit has become for the public a symbol of government failure, Mr. Mann argues. The old confidence that government could control events has evaporated, Mr. Curtin adds. And as a result, people accept cutbacks to reduce the deficit, although some economists argue that in hard times, deficit reduction might make matters worse.



The New York Times

Many Americans are too young to remember what sustained optimism is like.

Presidential rhetoric, which helped to elect Bill Clinton, is aimed at turning this attitude around. "But if Mr. Clinton can't make things better, then diminished expectations might become entrenched," Mr. Jencks said, "or people might grab at some other straw."

The shift from optimism to resignation is most clearly measured in the University of Michigan's monthly poll of 500 representative Americans. The poll goes back to 1951, making it the nation's oldest measure of public sentiment. People are asked whether they believe their own finances and the national economy will be better, worse or the same over the next one to five years.

The answers are converted into an index of consumer expectations. During the 1950's, the index averaged 15 percent above the average for the entire 42-year period, and in the 1960's the average for the decade rose to 17 percent above the long-term average. And then the change came, with the average for the 1970's falling to 13 percent below the long-term average.

The booming 1980's saw a bit of an improvement. That was a decade in which some Americans became very wealthy, many lost well-paying jobs and Corporate America struggled to win out against foreign competitors. But with the election of George Bush and the simultaneous onset of economic slowdown, the index sank for the opening years of the 1990's, to 17 percent below the long-term average.

Separate, periodic surveys show that the majority of people under 45 years of age consider their financial situations to be worse than those of their parents at the same age, while people over 45 consider themselves to be better off than their parents.

But there is a silver lining. The diminished expectations today are not much different from the pessimism in 1950, when the Depression trauma still made Americans expect the worst, not the best. Just a few years of rising prosperity made spirits soar. "This is the land of the booster," Mr. Jencks said. "If people can find anything to crow about, they will get back on the bandwagon."

So Who Are We?

Ethnic Pride Confounds The Census

By FELICITY BARRINGER

I'm Nobody! Who are you?
Are you — Nobody — too?

HALF a century after Germany exported the science of statistics, fueling the 19th century's rage to classify absolutely everything, a reclusive Massachusetts poet wrote this paean to the unclassified and unclassifiable. But Emily Dickinson's idyll of anonymity, written in 1861, is something the American body politic has never been able to accommodate.

Since the founding of the republic, the United States Government has dispatched census takers to classify everyone in sight — by sex, by property and most importantly, by race. And one way or another, the categories have been used to decide who was entitled to rights and privileges, and who was not.

On the census form, people get a chance to match their sense of their own identity with the Government's classifications. Increasingly, if the 1990 census is to be believed, people find no match. Offered four different basic choices of race — white, black, American Indian/Alaskan Native and Asian/Pacific Islander — 10 million Americans, most of them later determined to be Hispanic, marked "Other."

So who are we, anyway? In the 203 years since census takers first fanned out, 26 racial categories have been used, according to Reynolds Farley, a University of Michigan demographer. As planning for the year 2000's census begins, experts believe there will be more racial groups to chose from than ever. Emily Dickinson notwithstanding, nobody in the United States is nobody.

The Government has found a new way to classify its people virtually every decade. Even the two sturdiest categories — "White" and "Negro/Black" — have been taken apart every now and again. In 1890, census takers were given guides to help them be "particularly careful to distinguish between blacks, mulattoes, quadroons and octoroons."

When it came to classifying who was "white," the Supreme Court got involved in the early 1920's. After several foreigners applied for citizenship available only to whites, the Court made the following distinctions: Armenians and Syrians were "white," Japanese and those from the Indian subcontinent were not.

In 1930, nine racial classifications were on the census: "White, Negro, Mexican, Indian, Chinese, Japanese, Filipino, Hindu and Korean." In 1940, the Mexican classification was gone; Mexican-Americans had complained.

Now put racial history on fast-forward, through the civil rights movement, into an era when it seemed that the best government was color-blind government. For a couple of years in the late 1960's, Dr. Farley said, New Jersey stopped classifying babies by race. This didn't last.

In 1978, the Office of Management and Budget issued Statistical Directive 15, the basis of modern racial and ethnic classifications.

Originally, O.M.B. wanted to declare that Asian Indians were white — the reverse of the declaration the Supreme Court made in 1923. But in the half-century since then, "nonwhite" status had begun to have compensations: the new crop of affirmative-action policies, minority contracting set-asides and antidiscrimination laws.

"Persons with origins from the Indian subcontinent were moved from the 'Caucasian/White category' after the Association of Indians in America successfully lobbied to be included in the 'Asian/Pacific Islander' category," said Juanita Tamayo Lott, president of a demographic consulting firm.

This has become a typical sequence of events for government statisticians. There is nothing like changing racial attitudes to wreak havoc with the orderly progress of statistics.

Tribes: Sioux, Haitian, Polish

For instance, in the 1970's, racial pride was becoming a central element of the culture. As more people searched for an ethnic identity, numbers in some groups swelled quickly. Jeffrey Passel, an Urban Institute demographer, said birth and death records indicated that the American Indian population increased by 760,000 between 1970 and 1990. But the number of people telling the census they were American Indians rose by 1.4 million.

In 1990, according to Harry Scarr, the Census Bureau's acting director, 8 percent of the 1.8 million people who said they were American Indians then identified themselves as members of these tribes: Haitian, Polish, African-American, Hispanic or Arab.

Hispanic, introduced as an ethnic category (under "Spanish surname") in 1970, has not been considered a racial subgroup since 1930. As a result, in the 1980 and 1990 censuses — and probably in the year 2000 — the group that is eventually expected to become the largest nonwhite population has no racial classification. In 1980, about 40 percent of Hispanic respondents marked "Other Race."

There are more battles of ethnic identity to come. Some Hawaiians, for instance, want to be classified "Native American," not "Pacific Islander." But the biggest conceptual fight, the experts expect, will come from a growing generation who want neither assimilation nor a single group identity. As Mr. Scarr put it, "Some advocates argue that Census procedures — in fact all governmental and administrative systems — do not allow persons of mixed parentage to report their 'true' racial identity."

In 1990, about 28 percent of those answering an open-ended "ancestry" question listed two or more ethnic groups, like "Irish and Ukrainian." But some children of white-black or white-Asian parents identify simply as "mixed," and they want the census to let them do this officially.

It is unclear whether the Government will do that. An updated version of Dickinson might.

The Tearing Apart Of Yugoslavia: Place by Place, Family by Family

By ROGER COHEN

BELGRADE

WHETHER or not peace is restored to the former Yugoslavia any time soon, the trauma and psychological dislocation of its inhabitants is already so profound after two years of fighting that peacemaking could well take generations rather than months or years.

Nowhere has the disintegration of Yugoslavia been more lacerating than in the former nation's many mixed marriages — unions that cut across ethnic lines that have now become the frontiers of war.

Take Gordana Momcilovic, a 22-year-old bank employee who persists in calling herself a Yugoslav. Her father is a Serb, her mother a Croat, and her home once illustrated the blossoming of the idea of a nation uniting the southern Slavs.

When war broke out between Serbia and Croatia in 1991, the family was living in Croatia. In August that year, Ms. Momcilovic recalls, her father, a Yugoslav Army pilot, announced that they would have to move to Serbia. "He asked my mother, in front of me, if she wanted to stay in Croatia or come with us," she says. "In the end, my mother came."

By that time the question was highly poignant. Ms. Momcilovic's 23-year-old brother was already dead. He had opted to join the Serbian side when the fighting started. Croatian troops killed him near Osijek. Her father's three brothers also died in the same region.

"I cannot hate the Croats for killing my brother and my uncles, because if I did, I would have to hate my mother," Ms. Momcilovic says. "I am unable to hate my mother. Often I ask myself what I am now. The only answer I find is that I am a Yugoslav and will always be a Yugoslav."

Ms. Momcilovic's anguish is widely shared. The best estimate is that close to 15 percent of marriages in the former Yugoslavia were mixed. Many have been torn asunder.

Everywhere people go through painful rites, large and small, of separation and rupture. Duska Anastasijevic, a 25-year-old Serbian student and translator, struggles still with the painful realization that Croatia and its beautiful Dalmatian coast are now another country.

'A Sense of Loss'

"We are full of a sense of loss," she says. "To me the worst, the least acceptable, and I am talking now of my emotional life and not the killings, is the loss of Dalmatia. I can still feel the stones of Dubrovnik beneath my bare feet — their coolness, their smoothness, their ancient undulations.

"I cannot imagine that I will not feel those stones again. But Dalmatia is now in another land where I suppose I must be hated."

Faced with such jarring realizations, people ask why. They recall the time when they lived together and often did not know or care whether their neighbor was a Serb, a Croat, a Muslim or a Montenegrin; and they wonder now how that time could be washed away in a tide of hatred.

Some see international plots aimed at carving up the Balkans, arguing that it suits major powers like Germany and the United States to deal with small, militarily feeble, economically dependent countries.

Many blame the politicians, men like President Slobodan Milosevic of Serbia and President Franjo Tudjman of Croatia, who had been faithful Communist apparatchiks until it suited them to become nationalists in order to cling to power.

Others blame Yugoslavia's former Communist leader, Tito, for fostering the nation's great lie: that the savage civil war fought by Croats, Serbs and Muslims between 1941 and 1945 could be forgotten and buried without judgment.

When Tito's Communist clamp was lifted, an explosion fed by the simmering ethnic hatreds of the 1940's ensued. Gordon Babic, a businessman from Sarajevo with a Serbian father and Muslim mother, was caught in the middle. His family fled the Bosnian capital for Belgrade last year. "I used to believe the world was governed by the laws of Isaac Newton," he says, "but after a year of the Bosnian war I believe Satan pulls the strings. This is pure madness."

> 'After a year of the Bosnian war,' says a man of mixed Serbian and Muslim parentage, 'I believe Satan pulls the strings.'

The madness is captured in the appalling proliferation of maps here. Mottled monsters, they chart the makeup of what was Yugoslavia, by race, religion and nationality.

The maps are now sordid weapons of propaganda, pointed to in any argument over why some patch should belong to one ethnic group rather than another. But in better days, they demonstrated how intertwined, through marriage and movement, Serbs, Croats, Muslims and others had become.

"The ethnic map of prewar Bosnia, and indeed prewar Yugoslavia, was like a jaguar's skin," said Vuk Draskovic, the main Serbian political opponent of President Milosevic. "The peoples were inseparably mixed. No magician could make ethnic borders on such a jaguar's skin."

But all the armies have been trying. "Ethnic cleansing" — the killing and forced shifting of people to create ethnically homogeneous areas — has, in turn, become the most overused term in the land. Ibrahim Rugova, the leader of the majority Albanian community in the Serbian province of Kosovo, says Albanians are suffering "a quiet process of ethnic cleansing." He says Serbian oppression is forcing Albanians to leave.

Serbs in Kosovo, meanwhile, say they are suffering "ethnic cleansing" by the Albanians, who have been boycotting Serbian businesses to further their drive for an independent state.

This exasperates John Erath, an American diplomat. "Ethnic cleansing is an expression that is losing its meaning," he said.

Meaning is generally elusive today in what was Yugoslavia. Two years of war have bequeathed emotional exhaustion. "I'm O.K. because I have to be O.K.," says a woman in Belgrade. "Otherwise I'll die. And I don't want to die."

Young people are emigrating, perhaps as many as 200,000 from Serbia alone over the past year. Those that remain are in limbo. "People are tired," says one young woman. "They have no emotional energy left. Couples tend to stay together and single people do not get together. There seems to be no point in coupling."

This emotional emptiness means that it is hard to draw any reaction from people, even against leaders who have taken the country to economic disaster and ruin.

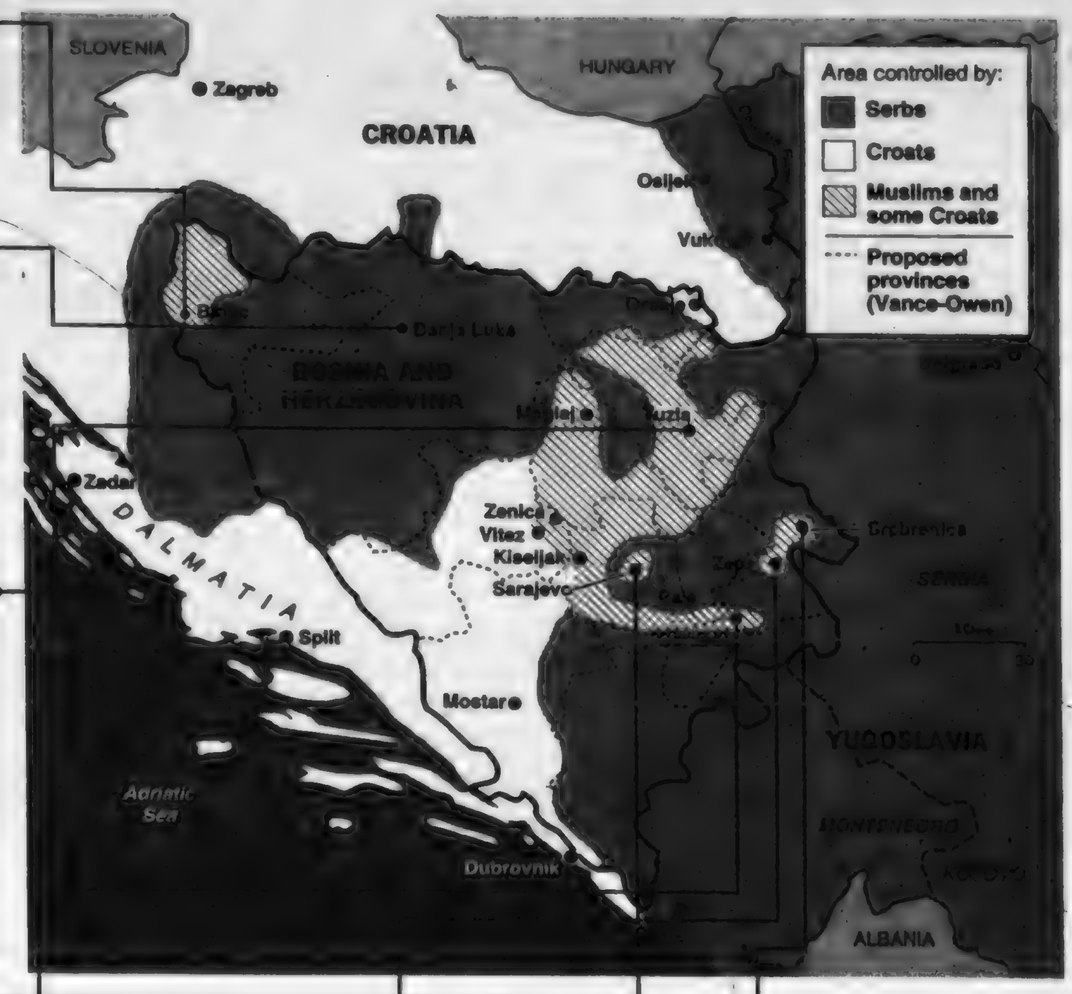
Every evening the desolating images fill the television screens: mutilated bodies, charred corpses, tales of rape and castration. There is a peculiar savagery to the butchery in Bosnia, even by the standards of war, a savagery also evident in the 1941-45 period, when babies were shot.

Why such horror? "You have to understand the fratricidal element to the bestiality," says Zarka Kovac, a prominent psychologist. "These are people with scarcely any physical differences. The Muslims are Serbs or Croats converted during the Turkish occupation. So you mutilate the person you have killed in order not to recognize your brother. This war is Cain and Abel."

Already, it is a war that has remade the Balkan map. Referring to the shape of Yugoslavia, which resembled a bird, and to the current slithering tangle of borders, Bojan Jovanovic, a Belgrade University anthropologist, said: "The bird that was Yugoslavia died in the night and in its place came several lizards."

Bosnia: The Situation Inside and Out

Through all the debate last week over whether to intervene to stop the fighting in Bosnia and Herzegovina, Serbian attacks against Muslims continued. The United Nations Security Council proclaimed Sarajevo and four other besieged areas of Bosnia — Bihac, Zepa, Gorazde and Tuzla — to be "safe areas," but approved no measures to enforce its order. (The council had already declared the besieged eastern town of Srebrenica to be a "United Nations protected area" on April 16). Allied forces watched, from planes overhead, and waited.



BIHAC Serbian forces last week mounted an unsuccessful infantry assault on this western enclave, whose predominantly Muslim population is estimated at 267,000, including many refugees. The city's prewar population was only 71,000.

BANJA LUKA Bosnian Serbs were blamed for bombs that last week destroyed two 16th century mosques in the city, where there are 35,000 to 80,000 non-Serbs. The population has swelled because local Serbian extremists have expelled thousands of Muslims and Croats from districts surrounding the city, the largest in the Serbian-controlled swath of Bosnia.

TUZLA Fighting in the area last week centered on the outlying towns of Brcko and Gradacac, key Serbian targets because they control important sections of the overland corridor between Serbia and Serbian-held areas in western Bosnia and Croatia. There are 725,000 people in the industrial city and surrounding districts, tens of thousands of them refugees. The only link with central Bosnia, and the outside world, is a single dirt road over high mountains.

SARAJEVO The multi-ethnic Bosnian capital, under siege by Serbian forces throughout the war, experienced a relatively quiet week, with reports of only sporadic shelling and sniper fire. Its population is 380,000, down from 526,000 before the war because many residents have fled. About 1,500 United Nations troops are there to supervise aid distribution and the airport.

GORAZDE The area has been under siege for more than a year, though there were few reports of fighting last week. Its prewar population of 37,000 has swelled to 70,000 because of refugees fleeing Serb offensives. The only link with the outside world is a mountain track to central Bosnia crossed only on foot or horseback.

ZEPA Unconfirmed reports from this eastern mountain enclave spoke of fierce Serbian attacks and penetrations of Muslim defense lines. The enclave's population is estimated at 30,000 to 40,000 people, more than three-fourths of them refugees and about 8,000 of them children.

SREBRENICA Though open warfare has waned, Bosnian Serb militiamen maintain their chokehold on this predominantly Muslim town protected by the United Nations. Officials have expressed concern that malnutrition and poor sanitation might lead to epidemics. There are about 49,000 people in the enclave, thousands of them refugees.

The Victims

The Bosnian Government says 135,000 people have been killed in Bosnia, in addition to the more than 25,000 deaths in earlier fighting in the Yugoslav war, primarily in Croatia.

The United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees estimates that the war has created 4.4 million refugees, equal to the population of Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1991.

United Nations Forces

Their safety is a primary concern as the United States and its allies consider intervention. There are 9,000 United Nations troops throughout Bosnia, primarily involved in relief efforts. Their main headquarters is in Kiseljak, near Sarajevo. An additional 14,000 peacekeeping troops are deployed in United Nations-protected areas of Croatia. Their headquarters is in Zagreb.

Outside Forces

NO-FLIGHT ENFORCEMENT Nearly 100 aircraft are involved, from the United States, France, Britain, the Netherlands, Turkey and NATO. The planes, including AWACS radar surveillance aircraft, fly from a variety of European bases, especially from Italy, across the Adriatic. Twelve American warplanes assigned to the mission fly from the carrier Theodore Roosevelt in the Adriatic.

SANCTIONS ENFORCEMENT Seven NATO warships patrol in two groups in the Adriatic, along with five ships from the Western European Union. The effort also includes increased customs inspections and patrols along the Danube River.

STANDING BY The United States carrier Theodore Roosevelt, cruising in the Adriatic with five other American warships, has more than 50 warplanes that could be used in bombing raids. There are 6,000 marines on board. Presumably, United States Air Force planes would be sent to bases in Italy and also participate in air strikes.

As Clinton Fumes, Bosnia's Serbs Smirk and Keep Firing

the Europeans also put a "we live here, you don't" cast on their argument. Even more than a Serb victory, which some European leaders are convinced is inevitable, the Europeans fear a widening of what they see as a civil war. The French, British and Russians are particularly reluctant to see the arms embargo lifted, lest this create an Afghanistan-style conflict on Italy's border.

Despite their polite statements to Mr. Christopher that they rejected no options, privately they stuck to their own agenda. When the British heard that the French had told Mr. Christopher that they did not reject arming the Bosnian Muslims "in principle," urgent telephone calls from Foreign Secretary Douglas Hurd and Defense Secretary Malcolm Rifkind to their French counterparts followed. The British won assurances that the French had not softened their position.

The British and French even began to draft a counter-strategy: the creation of safe havens to be protected by the threat of air power. Mr. Christopher objected that such havens would act as magnets for Muslims and thus contribute to "ethnic cleansing," and would be impossible to protect without ground troops.

But that, in some ways, was just the point. More than anything, the Europeans want to bring the Americans into Bosnia, because they know that once American force is committed, Bosnia will become primarily an American problem. And that is just what Mr. Clinton wants to avoid.

In effect, the Bosnian Serb decision to spurn the internationally backed peace plan, on grounds that it will make them return the spoils of war, also set up some hard tests for the outside players in Bosnia.

For Mr. Clinton, it is a test of his leadership, his first foreign policy crisis. Can he break the gridlock and lead the allies into action? Can he tell them — and the American people — in plain language what he means to do, and then get it done?

> More than anything, Europe wants Bosnia to be an American problem.

For the allies, the challenge is equally difficult. France, Britain and Canada already have troops in Bosnia as peacekeepers, delivering food, protecting civilians, moving the wounded and taking casualties. This is one reason they have resisted efforts to punish the Serbs, fearing retaliation against these lightly-armed troops. But with Bosnia's Serbs still defiant, peacekeeping may be an invitation to more aggression.

For the Russians, eager for a new relationship with the West, the test is whether they can put to rest lingering suspicions that they will go their own way on policy in the Balkans, heedless of Western concerns. President Boris N. Yeltsin was so resistant to the kind of military intervention envisioned by the Americans that when Mr. Christopher came calling, he delegated the task of listening to the American proposals to his Foreign Minister, Andrei V. Kozyrev. Mr. Kozyrev warned that the Bosnian Serbs would face an indescribable earthly hell if they did not embrace the peace plan. But after the Pale vote, the Russians were telling the Americans they wanted to wait until after a referendum scheduled by the Bosnian Serb parliament for next weekend before considering more forceful action.

For Serbia's leader, Slobodan Milosevic, the test is whether his sudden willingness to press his Bosnian Serb clients to make peace is for real. He has, in the past, sacrificed allies when he feared for his own future, and perhaps that was what he was doing when he pledged last week to cut off the fuel, weapons and ammunition that have sustained the Bosnian Serbs. But then, Mr. Milosevic has proven himself a master of duplicity.

For the moment, each side is still acting as if it has the luxury of time to play for advantage, fiddling while Bosnia burns. Despite the harsh oratory and diplomatic flurry, the situation on the ground continues to deteriorate. Mr. Christopher's favorite mantra in discussing the Bosnia crisis is, "What is the endgame?" but no one dares predict what the next few months will look like or what kind of place Bosnia will eventually be.

At worst, the conflict will spill beyond Bosnia's borders and draw other countries into a prolonged and bloody war. At best, there will be an embrace of the peace plan, enforced by United Nations peacekeepers.

But the best solution is by no means a good one. The model would certainly not be Cyprus, where United Nations peacekeepers leisurely patrol a clear dividing line between Greeks and Turks. Rather, what can be expected is an uneasy peace, with Bosnia divided into a mosaic of ten semi-autonomous provinces of ethnic hatred. More than 50,000 soldiers — nearly half of them American — would police it in a dangerous, open-ended, costly mission under a plan that imagines that Bosnia's Serbs, Croats and Muslims will all participate equally in a weak central government. That is why the usually cautious Mr. Christopher calls Bosnia "a problem from hell" and why there is no rush to descend into it.

Why Spy?

The New Challenges for the C.I.A. Are Open Secrets

By DOUGLAS JEHL

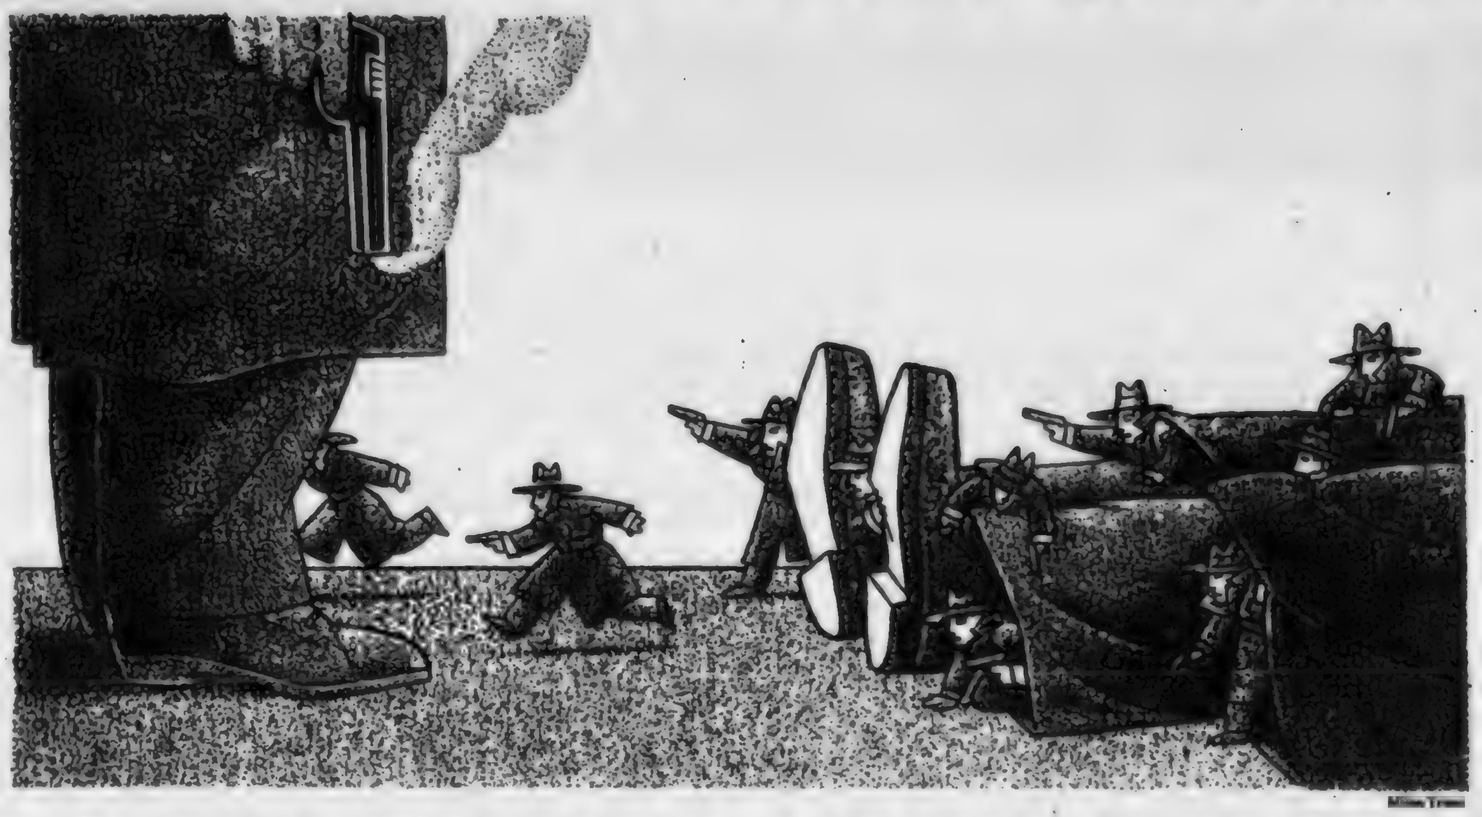
WASHINGTON

BEHIND closed doors these days, Congress and the Clinton Administration are agonizing over openness. Their task is to figure what best to do with American spies in a less secret world.

The agony is in some part pleasure: the post-cold war reassessment represents a reward. But if an open world leaves less reason to worry about the Russians, it appears more prone to unpredictability. For intelligence agencies, it probably raises more questions than it solves.

Even in recent days, there have emerged fresh demands — reminders that the black and white of old disguised countless shades of gray. From France, an ally: the disclosure of a document instructing agents to seek American corporate secrets, a discovery that has prompted the United States to boycott the Paris Air Show in June. From Pakistan, a fast-fading ally: new signs of missile shipments from China that have added to fears of the Pakistani nuclear threat.

And from the former Yugoslavia, once obscured by the East-West divide: an ethnic splintering so vicious that reaction to an American military intervention remains anyone's guess.



Milton Tramm

But the lawmakers and spymasters facing such pressures have also found themselves forced to confront fiscal reality. On Capitol Hill, where wrangling over a still-classified spy budget has already begun, Democrats have voiced deep misgivings about a request whose $28 billion size is one of Washington's most public secrets. That is even more than Congress allotted last year, and in its defense Mr. Clinton and his Director of Central Intelligence, R. James Woolsey, have made plain that in the future spies will have to make do with much less.

Striking a new balance between those resources and tasks is shaping up as a wrenching conversion. One plan calls for a 17.5 percent cut in intelligence staffs by 1997. There is talk of building satellites that can eavesdrop and take pictures at the same time.

Even efforts to simplify carry short-term complications. A plan by the Central Intelligence Agency to merge records kept separate for security reasons has been a computer technician's nightmare. And while a Presidential directive disclosed last week will lead to the release of hundreds of thousands of classified documents, it has opened an internal Government debate about what should still be kept secret.

Exactly what will come of the rethinking remains hostage to dozens of official reviews. But soundings from Congressional and intelligence officials have given hints about the emerging shape of the country's post-cold war spying enterprise.

Most suggestions that it be disbanded appear to have been replaced by acceptance of intelligence as cost-effective insurance. Moreover, intelligence agencies are likely to be spared the deep cuts inflicted on the military.

One reason is that unlike armies, spying cannot easily be compressed into a rapid deployment force. To be effective, a spy must be in place long before a crisis breaks. The other reason has to do with a metaphor favored by Mr. Woolsey. He describes the new world as a jungle in which a dragon has been slain but there remain many deadly snakes, and even his critics accept that the job for spies is to judge which might strike next.

Openness has certainly made that task easier; Bosnia, for all its fearsome hatred, has become a relatively penetrable place. But a generally accepted list of current intelligence priorities is a reminder of just how closed the world remains.

At its top are still the nuclear weapons of the former Soviet Union, still the stuff of secrets. Next in turn come North Korea and Iran, for their nuclear aspirations, support of terrorism and hostility to the West. Next are hair-trigger tensions between Pakistan and India, both becoming more deadly as nuclear powers.

For spies, the obstacles these countries now pose may be even more formidable than those presented by the cold war. North Korea is more closed than Moscow ever was; Pakistan has taken particular care to disguise its missile imports. To keep track of radical Islamic fundamentalism, the C.I.A. is beginning a major effort to teach employees Farsi and the Turkic languages of Central Asia.

Meanwhile, the targeting of American corporate secrets by French spies has renewed an appetite for the United States to respond in kind. Since prosperity is a measure of security, the debate is over how far spy agencies should go in pursuit of economic intelligence.

All signs are that the answer will be to stop short of industrial espionage, still an American taboo. Even if some allies have no qualms about stealing secrets for Government-backed industries, officials warn that the same approach would leave American spies favoring private companies. Officials say it is more likely that the United States will fend off the French and other advances with public protests.

But there is unmistakable new eagerness for missions not usually given much status in American spying. And the half-shrugs with which Government officials responded last week to the arrest of a State Department official for passing secrets to Greece hinted at new rules in which spying by allies has become a less-mortal sin. Just as the United States did its best to get advance tips about Soviet arms proposals, Government officials acknowledge that top priorities now include the positions that economic rivals intend to adopt in high-stakes trade negotiations.

Ecology and Rights

The parallel shift in policymakers' attention to issues like the environment has also not escaped the spymasters' attention. The National Intelligence Council, responsible for issuing spy agencies' assessments about the world, has been expanded to include a 12th officer to oversee the environment, human rights and other so-called global affairs.

Almost no one pretends, however, that this is what spy agencies are best equipped to do. The impetus appears instead to come from an aspiration that intelligence be all-knowing — and from a reluctance to admit that it cannot.

Asked where they might make do with less spying, officials sometimes point to Europe and Africa, no longer theaters of the cold war. But even that scale-back could leave them awkwardly telling the White House, "We don't know."

It may be years before choices made today are proven wise or foolish. But the greatest danger may be that intelligence will spread itself too thin. Perhaps most important is that officials stop thinking about what is possible, and start thinking about their needs.

Old Spymaster Sneers at His Trial by 'Polite Society'

As the spymaster of Communist East Germany, Markus Wolf for years skirted national laws in the murky pursuit of espionage. Last week Mr. Wolf found himself at the mercy of the rule of law, and assailing the unfairness of its application in his case, as he went on trial in Düsseldorf, Germany, on charges of treason and espionage against the country that absorbed his own in 1990. Here are excerpts from his statement in court.

I am submitting to this trial because I would like to live in this country, which is my homeland. I respect the laws of the Federal Republic of Germany, whether I like them or not. But I became a citizen of the Federal Republic of Germany only on Oct. 3, 1990. Until that day, I was a citizen of the German Democratic Republic. . . . The G.D.R. was internationally recognized and a member of the United Nations, pledged to respect its charter. Its intelligence services had the same legitimate right to exist as the corresponding services of the F.R.G.

Reuters

Markus Wolf at his trial last week.

To justify a charge of treason . . . is so absurd, legally untenable and literally incomprehensible that it goes against common sense. What country am I supposed to have betrayed?

After my arrest, the chief prosecutor revealed one of the reasons with astonishing frankness, answering one of my questions with the cool observation that the public wanted scapegoats.

The intelligence services of both sides stood opposite each other during the cold war. Whether their methods were essentially different is something that may have to be extensively examined and thoroughly explored in the course of my defense. I have nothing to fear from the comparison. The methods of intelligence services are not measured by the moral yardstick of polite society anywhere in the world, especially not during the cold war confrontation.

The Power — and Limits — of a Propaganda Weapon

TV Coverage of Unrest in Moscow: a Blurred Reception

By CELESTINE BOHLEN

Moscow

THE raw film footage from Leninski Prospekt on the 9 P.M. television news was the first that most Russians knew of the violent clashes that day between Communist demonstrators and police in Moscow. After a brief introduction, the anchorwoman said grimly: "We think these scenes speak for themselves."

There followed no commentary, just the noises and shouts picked up by the soundman as the camera followed the mini-riot: the fights, the beatings, the trucks on fire, the arrival of the mounted police. The film clip opened with a charge by young men wielding rods and clubs against the police. It closed with a chilling image of Leninski Prospekt, one of the broadest and cleanest of Moscow's six-lane avenues, littered with rocks, thick with smoke, scattered with people running about in anger and panic.

That was the night of May 1. The scenes came as a terrible shock to most viewers, even though for months now, some Russian politicians among both the reformers and the conservatives have been warning that at any moment, the power struggle between President Boris N. Yeltsin and his conservative opponents could spill out onto the streets and even, some have said, spark a civil war.

By the end of last week, the May Day events had become the dominant issue in Russia's continuing power struggle, and their presentation in the news broadcasts offered new evidence to support the Kremlin's faith in the power of television as a political weapon. But the same newscasts also produced new evidence of television's limits as a weapon, if only because so many Russians long ago became jaded by exposure to telecast propaganda.

Until now, the Russian public has reacted to scare talk about the continuing political drama being played out in Moscow with appropriate skepticism. Until now, there has been little evidence that either side is capable of arousing passion of any sort, except perhaps disgust. In fact, the outbreak of violence on Leninski Prospekt was at most the work of a handful of fanatics, who hardly represent the feelings and misgivings of the people they claim to speak for, the millions of Russians who in the April 25 referendum cast their votes against Mr. Yeltsin and his policies.

But, for all the stated intentions of objectivity on the part of Russia's state-owned and controlled television, it was shock, even fear, that seems to have been the effect sought in the May 1 broadcast. The image created from the clashes on Leninski Prospekt is of a demonized "opposition," deserving of public scorn and perhaps even vengeance.

Associated Press

A Communist supporter faces mounted riot police during a May Day clash between demonstrators and the police in Moscow last weekend.

No one except the most hardened of President Yeltsin's opponents has questioned the accuracy of the television footage shown first on the night of May 1, and repeatedly reshown in fragments since. The question is how it was used, and what it left out.

Witnesses agree that the demonstrators began the fight, and perhaps even orchestrated its most terrible moment, when a 25-year-old policeman was mortally injured in a collision between two trucks. But they also note that the vehemence of the police reaction was underplayed, and still has not been subjected to even routine scrutiny.

Instead, the main point of the television coverage has been to underscore Mr. Yeltsin's oft-repeated theme that his presidency and his program of reforms are caught up in a Manichaean struggle, a battle between the forces of light and the forces of darkness, between loyal, true democrats and the villains of a "red-brown," or neo-Communist and neo-Fascist, coalition.

Advantage: Yeltsin

The violence played right into his hands. The sight of young men beating policemen from the top of a flatbed truck festooned with the slogan "Only the dictatorship of the working man can save the country" certainly bolstered suspicions of a Bolshevik backlash. But such blatant aggression also led some people, particularly those inclined to believe the worst of the Kremlin, to believe that the whole event might even have been staged by secret pro-Yeltsin forces, to give the President an excuse to crack down on the hard-line opposition.

Russian newspapers, most of which have taken definite sides in the political battle, were typically quick to rush to judgment. "National-Communists Declare War against the State," blared a headline in the new liberal newspaper Sevodnya, or Today, while the front page of Tuesday's Pravda, the mouthpiece of the anti-Yeltsin opposition, called the events "A Bloody Rehearsal for a Dictatorship."

But the main battle over information here is not in the press, but on the television, which has become fully engaged on Mr. Yeltsin's side in recent weeks, particularly in the period leading up to the April 25 referendum.

While most news programs do try to give balanced coverage, allowing equal time for interviews with Mr. Yeltsin's opponents and speeches by them, regular programs have been frequently usurped for sympathetic portraits of Mr. Yeltsin at home with his family, and for harshly critical caricatures of Ruslan I. Khasbulatov, the speaker of the parliament, or Aleksandr V. Rutskoi, Mr. Yeltsin's rebellious Vice President.

A Familiar Tool

No one in Russia has ever had any doubt about the influence of television.

The Communists, when they were in power, made the universal availability of state television a higher priority than indoor plumbing, and the old Soviet evening news program Vremya — once the purveyor of happy news about good harvests, new factories and peaceful demonstrations — was watched religiously each evening by practically every household in the Soviet Union.

Glasnost, as Mikhail S. Gorbachev's policy of openness was called, gave journalists new freedoms, but the controls on television were never fully lifted, either under the Soviet regime or since. Just as Mr. Gorbachev two years ago was able to block coverage of Mr. Yeltsin's campaign for the Russian presidency, so Mr. Yeltsin has been able to squelch any serious treatment of his political opponents.

But if Russia's leaders have shown that they have not lost their old skills at manipulating the media, so Russian viewers and readers have proved that, for their part, they have not lost the ability to read between the lines. Two opinion polls, out last week, showed a healthy skepticism in the apportionment of blame for the violent May 1 clashes.

According to a telephone poll of 468 Muscovites, taken by the firm Express, 33 percent thought the demonstrators were responsible for the confrontation, while 29 percent thought the Moscow authorities were to blame. In another poll by the All-Russian Center for the Study of Public Opinion, which did a quick sample of 1,176 Muscovites, 46 percent thought that the demonstrators were solely to blame, while 27 percent thought the authorities, too, were in part responsible.

Conversations / Mildred Benson

A Ghostwriter and Her Sleuth: 63 Years of Smarts and Gumption

By PATRICIA LEIGH BROWN

MILDRED AUGUSTINE WIRT BENSON had just arrived in Chicago from Toledo, carrying a red leather pocketbook and wearing a crinkly plastic rain bonnet. The writer of 23 of the first 30 original Nancy Drew Mystery Stories had missed her connecting flight to Iowa, where she would be guest of honor at the first-ever Nancy Drew Conference.

Mrs. Benson — who is 87 but does not like to discuss her age because she is still a working professional — was lugging a sack of Nancy Drew books through O'Hare Airport's endless corridors and carrying a copy of the day's edition of The Toledo Blade, where she writes a weekly column called "On the Go with Millie Benson." On the front page was the headline: "Her Novels a Treasure: University of Iowa Honors Benson, Nancy Drew Author."

She turned wearily to a companion. "I'm so sick of Nancy Drew I could vomit," she said.

The 5-foot-zero, 110-pound author, aviatrix and newspaper columnist was dressed in a turquoise pants suit, which, she thought, after a protracted day of traveling, made her look "like an Iowa frump." As if that weren't enough, now she was stranded at O'Hare for five hours with a colleague 49 years her junior who spent her childhood addicted to Nancy Drew.

Like Nancy Drew in "The Bungalow Mystery," who was left to starve in a dank cellar, Mrs. Benson assessed the situation and knew her escape routes were limited.

"What kind of lead are you going to put on this horsey thing?" she said, suspiciously eyeing the reporter's notebook while she was sitting at an airport restaurant eating a turkey sandwich and french fries.

Until recently, Mrs. Benson's role as the original Carolyn Keene, a nom de plume beloved by generations of readers, was not widely known, a mystery that might be called "The Secret of the Sacred Pseudonym." Her anonymity basically suited her just fine. "I've kept it in the dark, especially locally," she explained. "I didn't want to be pestered."

Mrs. Benson's plucky 16-year-old girl detective — who drove a blue roadster, veering onto creepy detours just at the moment the sky turned ominous — was conceived by Edward Stratemeyer, founder of the Stratemeyer Syndicate, who hired ghostwriters to write the Nancy Drew mysteries. The Syndicate also produced "The Bobbsey Twins," "The Hardy Boys" and dozens of other juvenile series books. But it was Mrs. Benson who wrote the first one, "The Secret of the Old Clock," published in 1930, and who gave the blonde bobbed sleuth her gumption.

An Uncommon Woman

"I sort of liked the character from the beginning," she said. "Now that kind of woman is common, but then it was a new concept, though not to me. I just naturally thought that girls could do the things boys did."

Nancy Drew (she is rarely called Nancy) has served as a role model for generations, passed on from mother to daughter. She is now being viewed as a witty, independent heroine. Nancy Drew was always smarter than the grown-ups, with the possible exception of her father, Carson Drew, a prominent lawyer. Her family set-up alone was the stuff of girls' dreams. Carson Drew was always proud of his daughter's capacity to solve mysteries. (More important, he was a widower, so that his precocious daughter never had to compete for his affections.)

Among Nancy Drew's "chums" were Bess Marvin (the fraidy-cat) and her cousin George Fayne (the tomboy). Predictably perhaps, the chums were the subject of a talk at the conference called "Lesbian Code in Nancy Drew Mystery Stories."

Mrs. Benson fleetingly dropped her polite demeanor when informed of this theory. "This is the silliest, most out-of-the-picture thing I've ever heard! I'd like to blow a cork!" she said.

As the author of 120 to 130 juvenile series books (she can't remember exactly), Mrs. Benson was not only Carolyn Keene but also Frank Bell and Ann Wirt, to name two. Among her creations were the "Ruth Darrow Flying Stories" — after Ruth Elder, a pilot.

Mrs. Benson's life — she still flies airplanes — has tended to resemble her heroine's. A doctor's daughter, she was born in Ladora, Iowa, and had an active girlhood. She was an avid swimmer; a jewel of the Mildred Benson collection at the Iowa Women's Archives is a photo of young Millie doing a swan dive into the Iowa River.

In the 1930's, literary role models for young women were paltry, at best. But Mrs. Benson insists she didn't model Nancy Drew on her own experience: "I didn't consciously make her like myself. I made her good-looking, smart and a perfectionist. I made her a concept of the girl I'd like to be."

But Nancy wasn't her only icon. In "The Ghost of Ladora," a 1973 essay, she writes of Nancy Drew: "I did feel as if I were she, but then when I created the Dot and Dash stories for younger children, I likewise felt as if I were Dot's obnoxious dog, Dash."

She was the first woman to get a master's degree in journalism from the University of Iowa. Mrs. Benson has been married and widowed twice. She wrote some of the earliest Nancy Drews on her old Underwood typewriter by her first husband's bedside. One year she wrote 13 books — while working as a reporter.

Intriguing History

Mrs. Benson got paid $125 — plus Christmas bonuses — for writing each Nancy Drew book and, like most ghostwriters, signed a release denying any claim on the character. "You couldn't get any work in those days unless you signed a release," she said. "It never bothered me." The only thing that did, she said, "was a period when doubt was expressed that I'd written them."

The books' complex publishing history has been a source of intrigue. Starting in 1959, many of the books were rewritten and updated by Harriet Stratemeyer Adams, a daughter of Edward Stratemeyer. Mrs. Adams has erroneously been credited as the original Carolyn Keene. According to Deidre Johnson, a professor at West Chester University in Pennsylvania, Mrs. Benson "put flesh on the character," but Mrs. Stratemeyer kept the series alive throughout the 1960's until her death in 1982.

In recent years, a number of book collectors and would-be sleuths, chiefly Geoffrey S. Lapin, a cellist for the Indianapolis Symphony Orchestra, unraveled the identity of Nancy Drew's original author, who was honored publicly at the conference for the first time.

When not writing "On the Go With Millie Benson," a peppery mix of personal observations combined with profiles of 70-something bat girls and others, Mrs. Benson is on the go — regularly exercising at the gym and playing golf. Her golf average is "a secret greater than 'The Secret of the Old Clock.'" She glanced at her fellow journalist. "I just gave you a good quote, didn't I?"

She still loves to fly, although she no longer does loops and recently sold her Cherokee 180. "Some of my greatest adventures have been up in the sky," she said, recalling a near-miss at the edge of a tornado. She has also made nine solo trips to Central America to study Pre-Columbian archaeology.

To the woman who has written more than 120 tales, today's plot was obvious. "I'd tie this into being stranded here," she said, "if you want some advice from an old hack."

Nancy Drew has been a role model, passed from mother to daughter. But her first author has ducked notice: 'I didn't want to be pestered.'

Where We Stand

A Landmark Revisited

Recently I re-read "A Nation At Risk," the landmark report that started the education reform movement, and I was surprised at what I found. After 10 years, some of the words and ideas were still familiar, but I wasn't prepared for an exposition of what we would now call "systemic reform": figuring out what we want students to know and be able to do and making sure that all parts of the education system—standards, curriculum, textbooks, assessments, teacher training—move simultaneously toward the achievement of agreed-upon goals. This is the way successful school systems in other industrial democracies work, and it is why their students achieve at a much higher level than ours.

We didn't recognize "A Nation At Risk's" revolutionary thesis because we associated the report with Ronald Reagan. He opposed a federal role for education, and the solutions he proposed for complicated problems were simple and mischievous—for example, merit pay and vouchers. In fact, the report came from an independent commission appointed by Secretary of Education Terrel Bell, who had a very different agenda. Nevertheless, it was easy to ridicule something that emphasized the importance of subject matter and standards as an old-fashioned piece of nonsense.

States that tried to implement "A Nation At Risk" picked a few parts that were relatively easy to carry out and ignored the rest. For example, course requirements were increased in some places without looking at course content or changing the tests to bring them in line with the courses or making grades count for students. This approach to reform is like trying to build a four-legged stool with only one leg, and it's no surprise that student achievement hardly improved.

States that tried to implement the report picked a few parts that were easy to carry out and ignored the rest. This approach is like trying to build a four-legged stool with only one leg.

What were the important recommendations of the systemic reform "A Nation At Risk" proposed?

• Along with a call for rigorous content and high standards, the report took a stab at defining content standards in some basic subjects. And recognizing that if there was a single set of performance standards, it would be fixed at a minimum level, the report recommended what successful education systems in other industrialized countries have—different standards because students function at different levels. At the same time, it stressed the necessity of demanding "the best effort and performance from all students" and giving them the help they would need to meet those demands.

• In order to see how well students were meeting standards, the report recommended a system of curriculum-based exams. These exams would contrast sharply with the standardized tests we then relied on and still do—that is, tests that are divorced from curriculum and merely show how students or schools compare with one other without any reference to a standard of achievement.

• While stressing that teachers were not responsible for the terrible condition of education, the report acknowledged what is still true—that it would be hard to raise standards when "not enough academically able students are being attracted to teaching" and when teacher education leans so heavily on generic methods courses that teachers themselves say are worthless.

• The report found that colleges were partly responsible for poor student achievement. Because many of them had very low standards for admission, students were—and are—under no pressure to do well in high school. The report called on colleges to institute more "rigorous and measurable standards" to encourage higher student achievement.

"A Nation At Risk" was revolutionary in another way. At the time it appeared and since, many reports and studies have been fixated on teacher accountability for student achievement, ignoring the fact that in countries with successful school systems, students, not teachers, are held accountable for their achievement. This report supported student accountability, and that's the note on which it concluded. In the final pages, the authors addressed students directly, telling them that they were responsible, finally, for what they got out of school: "When you give only the minimum to learning, you get only the minimum in return. Even with your parents' best example and your teachers' best efforts, in the end it is your work that determines how much and how well you learn." "A Nation At Risk" got this right, too. Educational reforms are useless unless our kids take responsibility for their education, the way students in other countries do.

Until we agree on standards for what students should know and be able to do, assess them on their achievement of those standards and give them a reason to work hard in school by linking their achievement with what they want—access to college or to jobs—we will not raise student achievement. "A Nation At Risk" told us this 10 years ago, but we missed it. If we don't listen now, we'll have 10 more years without progress in student achievement.

Taking Names for Cleaner Politics

Maybe it was the fragrance of the Rose Garden that got President Clinton feeling so hyperbolic. His new campaign finance legislation "will change the way Washington works," Mr. Clinton said Friday.

Well, it is a start. What we have here is an important, if imperfect step toward cleaner politics. The plan contains breakthrough provisions for public financing of Congressional races and for eliminating soft money in Presidential campaigns.

But there is a glaring flaw, written in to placate House Speaker Thomas Foley. The President's bill fails to curb political action committees sufficiently or even to lower the $5,000 figure each PAC can give to a House member.

Still, the President can say that he is opening the road to reform if he makes Democratic legislators put their votes where his principles are. As the majority, Democrats on the Hill are obligated to fix the weak spots in the legislation, to break threatened Republican filibusters and to pass this legislation before the summer doldrums.

This draft took months of tortuous negotiations in sessions described as group therapy for nervous Democrats. The Senate majority leader, George Mitchell, pushed his colleagues to respond to the voters' demands for fairer elections. The House majority leader, Richard Gephardt, now grasps the need for fast action. Mr. Clinton accepted new ideas for curbing Beltway lobbyists.

The foot dragging in the crowd came from House Democrats. Not even face-to-face pleading by Mr. Mitchell and the President could budge Mr. Foley from wanting House members to get a third of their total contributions from PAC's in gifts up to $5,000. By letting the House have this shabby provision, Mr. Clinton and the other Democratic leaders won Mr. Foley's support for the rest of the package.

Why did Mr. Clinton back down on PAC's? It's power politics that the voters ought to remember in 1994. The majority for campaign reform is weak because some Southern Democrats may oppose public financing. Other Democrats, encouraged by Mr. Foley, have said they will support the President on public finance only if they can stay on the dole from PAC's.

The task now is to get quick favorable votes in both houses. Then it may be possible to use the conference committee to lower the $5,000 PAC gifts favored by the House Democrats.

Reformers are willing to give ground on PAC's to save public financing, which they view as the best way to give challengers a chance against Congressional incumbents. The Clinton plan offers vouchers for advertising, mailing and printing to candidates who accept spending limits. In a deft twist, Mr. Clinton would pay for these vouchers by eliminating the tax deduction for lobbying expenses.

His freshest proposal would ban contributions by lobbyists to any lawmaker they've lobbied within the last 12 months. Another approach, less susceptible to attack on First Amendment grounds, would amend Congressional rules to bar such contributions. With the Senate voting last week to disclose lobbyists' gifts, real change in Washington's culture of greed could be at hand.

This bill needs work, but the issue of serious political reform is now before Congress. Mr. Clinton says he intends to educate the public on why public financing can cure corruption and make elections more competitive. He should make a special point of campaigning in the backyards of Republicans who try to filibuster or Democrats who try to weaken this legislation. Voters should pay attention, too. It's time to start taking names.

Democracy's Obsolete Secrets

President Clinton has ordered a sweeping review of government secrecy now that the cold war is over. And he has posed some telling questions:

What information continues to require classification for the sake of national security? What can be done to avoid excessive classification and to declassify information as quickly as possible?

But Mr. Clinton may be seeking answers from the wrong people — those who have presided over the secrecy system. He'd do better to invite an independent commission to conduct the review.

Sometimes officials stamp a document secret before circulating it for the same reason that editors put a banner headline on a news story: to attract readers' attention. Even more often, the secrecy stamp is used to keep a document out of the hands of unwanted readers, like opponents in Congress or the bureaucracy.

Pervasive secrecy has pernicious effects. It inspires officials to overestimate the value of the secrets, compared with what is publicly known. It makes policy failures more likely by narrowing the circle of advisers. And it impedes Congress from exercising its constitutional responsibilities in foreign and defense policy.

Most perversely of all, it does a poor job of protecting the relatively few secrets that do need protection. When classified documents are commonplace, officials become careless about handling them and security staffs become overworked.

But the officials whom the President has asked to re-evaluate the system know all that; they are part of the system they are reviewing. That's just the problem. They may be too close to come up with new and imaginative answers.

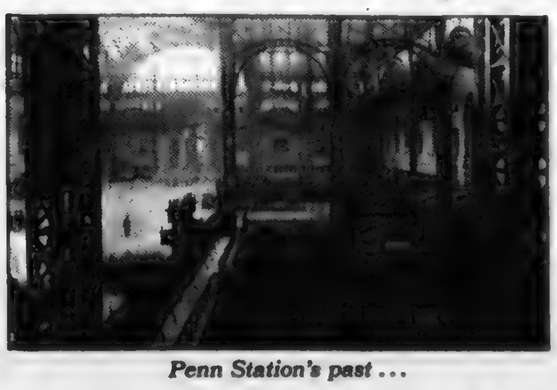
Restraining officials from abusing their secrecy stamps won't be easy. Memos are rarely kicked back to drafters for excessive classification, and officials are punished only for mishandling secret documents. Why not also reprimand them for overclassifying, as well?

Once a document is stamped secret, it is notoriously difficult to declassify it. Most documents should be declassified automatically after six years, restoring a sensible past practice. Exceptions will need to be made in extraordinary cases, but most of these documents can be reviewed after 10 years and declassified by a single agency without the consent of other agencies. Virtually all documents more than 30 years old should be declassified.

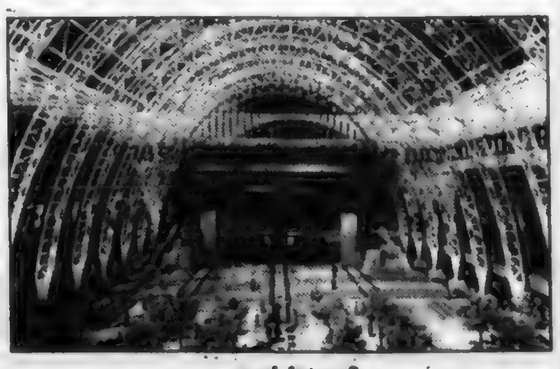
Other forms of secrecy also need to be reduced. Government agencies have fallen into the habit of proliferating special access or "black" programs, not just for intelligence and military operations, but also for building new weapons. Not only are the specifications of the weapons kept secret, which is understandable, but also the very existence of the acquisition program, which mindlessly impedes oversight.

The cold war secrecy system has distorted American democracy and sound decision making. Mr. Clinton needs to let in some sunlight.

A Noble Gateway for Gotham



Penn Station's past ...



... and future?

Rebecca West once astutely remarked that America's cathedrals were the great railway terminals like Grand Central and Pennsylvania Station in New York. But in an act of unthinking desecration, Penn Station was demolished three decades ago to make way for a new sports arena. Ever since, 300,000 daily commuters and intercity rail passengers have scurried like beetles through the bowels of a makeshift terminal beneath Madison Square Garden that Amtrak describes as "minimally acceptable."

Fortunately, some alert and imaginative train lover gazed across Eighth Avenue and 34th Street at the striking but obsolescent General Post Office, which like the lamented Penn Station was also designed by McKim, Mead and White. The tracks pass right under the post office, most of whose workers will soon move to a new facility. Thus the thought occurred: Why not wrest a great urban gateway out of the bureaucratic shuffle?

A new Penn Station in the old post office would end the cheerless isolation of the Javits Center, now lost in an urban limbo three blocks west. It would give New York a terminal worthy of a new age of high-speed intercity trains along the Eastern corridor. Preliminary renderings are exhilarating: sun streaming through a lofty ceiling and comfortably accessible gates.

The main obstacle: conversion by 1999 would cost an estimated $315 million. The money would probably have to be contributed by Federal, city and state governments and raised through bonds backed by revenues from retail space.

Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan, now Finance Committee chairman, is for the idea: "You don't get a second chance like this often." New York's other Senator, Alfonse D'Amato, is worried about cost and safety of train tunnels: his concerns require a persuasive response.

But what's indisputable is that the project would lift the hearts of travelers and offer tardy penance for vandalism past.

Adopted Child's Heredity Is Not a Blank Slate

To the Editor:

Life begins with birth, not adoption ("Adoption Is Getting Some Harder Looks," Week in Review, April 25). There is no closer human relationship than that of a child to its own mother. It is the defining human relationship in which one person is nurtured to life in the body of another.

The adopted infant is no blank slate. He brings his chromosomes with him. The widespread supposition that love and other expenditures should enable the adoptive parents to expunge his heredity and homogenize him in their own image is even less realistic than it would be if he were their natural child.

Yet that supposition is inherent in our adoption procedure and accounts for some of its failings, such as the denial of an adult human being's right to know who he is. The destruction of the heredity and identity of the adopted person is a deprivation for which there is no compensation.

In the DeBoer/Schmidt custody suit, the parties involved and the legal and psychological experts as well as the general public have lost sight of the one important person — the child. It is neither the right of the would-be adoptive parents nor of the natural parents to the child but rather the right of the child to retain her true identity, to grow up with her natural parents and siblings.

If removed from the custody of the DeBoers, Jessica will know the pain of separation at age 2. If she is not removed from their custody, she will live with the pain of separation from her own family for the rest of her life.

Homes, Not Awards

To the Editor:

As an adoptee, I agree with proposed reforms ("Adoption Is Getting Some Harder Looks") such as requiring a longer waiting period before surrender, balanced counseling for birth parents and prospective adoptive parents, a birth fathers' registry, open records and lifelong visitation opportunities.

Because private adoptions seldom include adequate counseling and education support services, I believe that lawyers should be discouraged from arranging adoptions without agency participation. Further, adoption policy needs to be administered uniformly on a nationwide basis instead of being subject to the vagaries of state and local laws, as it now is.

The purpose of adoption is to provide stable, loving homes for children whose birth families are unable to raise them — not to award healthy white infants to deserving infertile couples. I would urge policy makers to keep this fact in mind as they make decisions affecting the formulation and application of statutes affecting adoption.

The War Against U.S. Movies and TV

To the Editor:

"The Administration's Trade War" (editorial, May 3), which is critical of Mickey Kantor, the United States Trade Representative, puzzles me. I cannot believe that you are unaware of trade barriers, border hedgerows, discriminatory taxation, restrictive entry rules, vexing regulations that many American products confront in the world, all aimed at shrinking American companies' access to the marketplaces of too many countries.

How and why do you so distinguish as protectionism and igniting a trade war an attempt by the Trade Representative to set right what is clearly out of balance?

I don't know anything about minivans or other products, but I am more than mildly informed about the trade cliffs erected in too many countries on this wracked and weary planet to prevent American movies and television programs from being able fairly to compete for the viewing favor of their citizens, to say nothing of productions that are systematically stolen by "video pirates."

The simple request of American producers of movies, television programs and home video material is to have available in foreign markets the same freedom of movement and protection of property that foreign companies find so alluring and seductive in ours. Is that protectionism? Or is it fair play?

When foreign countries apply constricting rules to United States visual entertainment, either by exiling us or eroding our access or just plain using quotas and other ingenious manacles to keep us out of the competitive game, what ought to be the response of the Trade Representative to these parliamentary-planted trade spikes in international marketplaces? A "thank you very much" and a warm, lethargic smile?

The Golden Rule of Trade is to treat others in your market as you would wish to be treated in theirs. And if some countries abuse this rule, should they not expect a response that demands a leveling of the board? Which is why the United States movie television/home video industry, one of America's glistening trade prizes, is always vigilant, for like virtue we are every day besieged. Mickey Kantor is standing at the bridge to make sure passage is open and in balance. American taxpayers ought to be grateful to him.

J.F.K. Assassination Records Still Secret

To the Editor:

On April 26, President Clinton issued a directive that purportedly would result in the declassification of millions of secret Government documents. His directive rings hollow in light of his failure to implement legislation that would have a similar impact in connection with the assassination of President John F. Kennedy.

On Oct. 26, 1992, President Bush signed the "President John F. Kennedy Assassination Records Collection Act of 1992," whose purpose was to make all Government records related to the assassination available for public review.

Section 7 of the Act required the President to appoint, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, not later than 90 days after the enactment of the act, a citizens' review board to facilitate the disclosure of the records. President Bush failed to act before he left office. Now President Clinton has as yet failed to act. Why?

Battery Packs Solve Electric Car Problem

To the Editor:

Re "Imagining the Electric-Car Future" (Business Day, April 28): The battery recharging problems of length of charging time, magnitude of charging currents and where to recharge overnight could be dealt with by using battery packs that are swapped at a service station.

The battery pack would be placed into the car's battery compartment from underneath. A small car would have one pack, larger vehicles would require more than one. Changing the battery pack would be accomplished by driving the car over a pit equipped with a hydraulic lift. An attendant in the pit would lower the exhausted battery pack and replace it with a freshly charged one. The task could probably be done in a few minutes.

The batteries would be handled like returnable bottles: you pay a deposit on a battery pack when you buy your car. At the service station you would pay the cost of the electricity to charge the battery pack plus a wear-and-tear fee. The service stations would be responsible for recharging, servicing and testing the battery packs. They would also be responsible for removing worn-out packs from service.

U.S. Needs Paris Air Show to Attract Buyers

To the Editor:

I was amazed at your article ("U.S. to Be a No-Show at the Paris Air Show," Business Day, April 29), which says that the Pentagon in a change of policy has decided not to show any United States military aircraft at the Paris Air Show in June. The reason given is ludicrous: that the aircraft manufacturers could be the object of French industrial espionage. The Pentagon says, however, its personnel may attend as "observers only."

These air shows and military hardware displays always attract military attachés from every country to inspect the equipment, photograph it and learn as much about the hardware as they can. This has never been considered "espionage" but the proper duty of these attachés.

Now the Pentagon says its personnel can go there with their cameras and photograph what they want, including Russian aircraft, but we won't allow any of our equipment to be displayed because foreign agents might look at it and, Heaven forbid, take pictures.

This new policy seems to reflect the position of the Administration, which with its slashing of the defense budget, base closings and across-the-board cuts in military forces will put 2.7 million defense workers and military personnel out of work. It is doubly strange from an Administration that is trying to pressure our international trading partners to buy more American goods.

It makes no sense not to display our military wares at these shows where buyers from the military forces of NATO and other friendly nations are looking to place orders. These orders might mean the difference between closing plants and keeping them open. Another bonus is that the defense industries can continue operating until the Administration wakes up and realizes we still live in a dangerous world.

2d Founder Died in Duel

To the Editor:

In the "Memorial to Alexander Hamilton" (April 24) there is an error. He was not "the only Founding Father to die in a duel." Button Gwinnett (1735-1777), a signer of the Declaration of Independence from Georgia, died in a pistol duel the year following the signing. This is the principal contributing factor to the scarcity of his autograph — rarest of all the signers.

New York's Comptroller Denies Ethics Conflict on Underwriter

To the Editor:

On March 17 Fleet Securities was selected by the Mayor's Office and the Office of the Comptroller as one of 23 co-managers on New York City's bond underwriting team. My Deputy Comptroller for Finance recommended Fleet and four other firms be promoted to this position based on evaluations by her professional staff, Fleet's No. 1 ranking as a seller of city bonds, and other indicia of Fleet's strong past performance. Before making her recommendation, my deputy consulted with the city's financial adviser; her recommendation was concurred in by representatives of the Office of Management and Budget and the Deputy Mayor for Finance.

Unfortunately, Fleet's promotion has been questioned ("Ms. Holtzman's Ethical Stumble," editorial, May 6). Seven months before the selection, my Senate campaign borrowed money from Fleet Bank, an affiliate of Fleet Securities. The loan complied with strict Federal campaign regulations that required it to be an arm's-length transaction, and on customary terms and conditions. Lawyers from the bank and my campaign reviewed the transaction to insure the loan met those standards. The campaign has paid about half the loan and all interest due.

News accounts have contained numerous inaccuracies. For example, there was no joint press conference announcing Fleet's promotion, nor was my campaign renegotiating loan terms during the selection process.

When my deputy recommended Fleet's promotion, she did not know about the campaign loan. Although I set the standards for the selection of underwriters, I did not participate in any way in the selection of Fleet; indeed, I did not know Fleet was applying for the promotion. Therefore, while there was no conflict of interest, because I was not involved in Fleet's selection, an appearance of conflict exists. This I regret deeply.

Public confidence in the integrity of the selection process, in my actions and in those of my office is vital. I am sorry that I didn't envision that Fleet Bank or an affiliate might seek city business as an underwriter, so that I might have informed the Mayor's Office and recused myself at the earliest possible time. I take full responsibility for this mistake.

To remedy the situation, on April 23 I recused myself formally from any dealings between my office and Fleet Securities. Further, to remove any question of appearances about Fleet's promotion, I asked Mayor David N. Dinkins to reconsider Fleet's application so that any decision about Fleet could be made based on all the facts and with the benefit of my formal recusal; he has done so.

Dethrone the Drug Czar

By Whitman Knapp

The nation was fortunate in President Clinton's selection of Lee Brown as Director of the Office of National Drug Control.

Having been police commissioner in Atlanta, Houston and New York, Mr. Brown has been in key positions to observe that a half-century of the Federal war against drugs has had a simple result: Each year, the Government has spent more on enforcing drug laws than it did the year before. Each year, more people have gone to jail for drug offenses.

Yet each year there have been more drugs on the streets.

Surely, Mr. Brown can have no interest in simply spending more money and filling more prisons. Indeed, he might well conclude that his mission is to find out how to eliminate his new job.

Milton Friedman, the Nobel laureate economist, has a simple explanation for the upward spiral with which Mr. Brown must contend. Law enforcement temporarily reduces the drug supply and thus causes prices to rise. Higher prices draw new sources of supply and even new drugs into the market, resulting in more drugs on the street. The increased availability of drugs creates more addicts. The Government reacts with more vigorous enforcement, and the cycle starts anew.

Mr. Friedman and those who share his views propose a straightforward way out of this discouraging spiral: Decriminalize drugs, thus eliminating the pressure on supply that creates an ever-bigger market. This, they contend, will reduce demand and reverse the cycle, much as a similar approach has cut into alcohol addiction.

I do not claim competence to evaluate this theory. But after 20 years on the bench, I have concluded that Federal drug laws are a disaster. It is time to get the Government out of drug enforcement. As long as we indulged the fantasy that the problem could be solved by making America drug free, it was appropriate that the Government assume the burden. But that ambition has been shown to be absurd.

Attorney General Janet Reno's statement on Friday that she hopes to refocus the drug war on treatment show's admirable determination, but she and Mr. Brown should understand that the drug problem is primarily a local issue, more properly the concern and responsibility of state and city governments.

If the possession or distribution of drugs were no longer a Federal crime, other levels of government would face the choice of enforcement or trying out Milton Friedman's theory and decriminalizing. If they chose the second route, they would have to decide whether to license drug retailers, distribute drugs through state agencies or perhaps allow drugs only to be purchased with a physician's prescription.

Paul Fisch

The variety, complexity and importance of these questions make it exceedingly clear that the Federal Government has no business being involved in any of them. What might be a hopeful solution in New York could be a disaster in Idaho, and only state legislatures and city governments, not Congress, can pass laws tailored to local needs.

What did the nation do when it decided to rid itself of the catastrophes spawned by Prohibition? It adopted the 21st Amendment, which excluded the Government from any role in regulation of alcoholic beverages and strengthened the powers of the states to deal with such matters.

That is precisely what the Congress should do with respect to drugs.

Whitman Knapp is a Senior United States District Judge for the Southern District of New York.

The war failed. Let the states enforce policy.

It should repeal all Federal laws that prohibit or regulate their distribution or use and devise methods for helping the states to exercise their respective powers in those areas.

But having created the problem by decades of ill-considered legislation, Congress can't just throw it back to the states without helping finance the efforts. That raises a host of complex problems, including apportionment of Federal monies among the states, restrictions on how the monies may be used, the ratio of Federal dollars for enforcement to those spent on treatment and the role of nongovernmental organizations that treat addicts.

Such problems will not lend themselves to easy resolution. After all, Prohibition was allowed to wreak havoc for a mere 14 years, while the drug warriors have been at it for many decades. Under Lee Brown's leadership, we may hope for a return to sanity. □

LESLIE H. GELB

Smog of Peace

Generations in world affairs are marked by their greatest challenges. Castlereagh of Britain and Metternich of the Austro-Hungarian Empire maneuvered to create stability and legitimacy in a Europe reeling from Napoleon's victories and defeat. Roosevelt, Churchill and de Gaulle rallied their nations to defeat Nazi Germany and Japan. From Truman to Bush, the task was to contain Soviet Communism and nurture freedom, and it was done.

For the Clinton generation, the challenges are much more diffuse, multiple and uncertain. Bill Clinton and his partners in world diplomacy are playing on a chessboard where international and domestic transactions form a seamless web, where the number of public and private players are barely countable let alone controllable, where the rules are yet to be defined, where the true nature of threats remains shrouded by their very multiplicity and complexity and where it is hard to judge what constitutes winning and losing.

The cold war's end has left statesmen in an impenetrable smog of peace. In this new world, there is no central challenge, and therefore there can be no central organizing principle for foreign policy.

Mr. Clinton and other leaders will find it hard to order their priorities. They will have to play all over the board until they can begin to make sense of things. The only sure star to guide them through the smog is this: they should do what they reasonably can to prevent the worst.

Such a modest formula falls far short of the precision of an algebraic equation and the moral clarity of the Ten Commandments. But it can serve to remind world leaders that history will not forgive them if they use economic hard times as an excuse for inaction, if they allow narrow short-term national concerns to destroy the long-term fruits of international cooperation and if they fail to see the ultimate material and moral rewards of being their brother's keeper.

The U.S. and other powers obviously cannot and should not use force in all places where people are killing each other. But to argue that the big powers or the U.N. should not intervene anywhere unless they intervene everywhere is pure sophistry. To intervene nowhere pleases only the foolish god of consistency. Leaders will have to practice highly imperfect international triage and save as many as they reasonably can. They cannot maintain civilization and look away.

The U.S. intervened in Somalia to give its people a chance to restore some order, not to remake Somali society. Similarly in Bosnia, the U.S. and its allies can win no military victory at reasonable cost nor can they extinguish ethnic hatreds by force. But they can use force to give Muslims a chance to defend themselves and lessen Serb genocide. And they need not be dragged into a quagmire if they make plain at the outset what lines they will not cross, as in Somalia.

Free trade negotiators have toiled for 30 years with only limited success to break down trade barriers. Yet without their modest accomplishments, the protectionist tide would have overwhelmed the one sure means to open markets and expand economies.

Asian nations are rapidly acquiring modern arms to match their mighty and growing economic power. Because of the easy availability of such weapons, this buildup cannot be stopped. But it can be attenuated by keeping U.S. troops in the region and by expediting security talks among Asians.

An equally staggering list of "new agenda" issues — helping Russia, population control, refugees, environment and the like — demand the attention of all. For none of these priorities are adequate monies available. But courageous leaders must squeeze some money from somewhere lest a tidal wave of misery overcome them.

The world herein described — where leaders will have to strive mainly to do what they can to prevent an endless array of challenges from overwhelming humankind — does not lend itself to grand dreams and visions. Nor should it inspire pessimism.

For all the horrors and blinding complexities unleashed by the cold war's end, the smog of peace is far preferable to the fog of war or the fog of the cold war. Peoples long chained in darkness have now tasted freedom, felt its material and spiritual blessings, and will not easily give it up. □

Smith Barney Shearson Darwin

By Louis Rukeyser

Let's take a look at the history of the firm that has become the most spectacular symbol of a striking characteristic of the entire brokerage industry for the past generation: the urge to merge.

We start in 1970, when a small institutional firm, Cogan, Berlind, Weill & Levitt, bought the old-line firm of Hayden Stone and took its name. In 1974, the growing company acquired the firm of Shearson Hammill and took a new name, Shearson Hayden Stone.

Meanwhile, the firm of Hornblower & Weeks, Hemphill, Noyes and Company, itself already a mouthful, merged with Spencer Trask and Company, thereby becoming Hornblower Weeks Noyes & Trask, which in turn merged with Loeb Rhoades and Company to form Loeb Rhoades, Hornblower & Company.

Now suddenly reappeared our old friend Shearson Hayden Stone to acquire Loeb Rhoades Hornblower and Company and become Shearson Loeb Rhoades.

Not far away, Kuhn Loeb and Company was merging with Lehman Brothers to become Lehman Brothers Kuhn Loeb.

Our old friend Shearson Loeb Rhoades, in the meantime, had been bought by American Express, and the resulting Shearson American Express then swallowed Lehman Brothers Kuhn Loeb, and before you could holler "Isn't anybody safe?" the resulting firm of Shearson Lehman Holdings had acquired E. F. Hutton, transforming itself into Shearson Lehman Hutton, which, before long, divested itself of the third name, apparently on the theory that these days when E.F. Hutton talks, nobody listens.

Sanford I. Weill, by now head of a company called Commercial Credit, merged it with Primerica, which itself had just acquired the venerable brokerage firm of Smith Barney, Harris Upham, and this year went on to gobble up the Shearson name, too, buying back his old firm from American Express, to which he had sold it in 1981 — meaning that every firm mentioned in this 23-year litany is now part of a single Wall Street goliath, which this summer will be renamed Smith Barney Shearson.

Evolution of a brokerage firm.

It used to be that many people had trouble keeping track of the names of the stocks they owned. These days, you're lucky if you can remember the name of the brokerage firm from one week to the next. □

ANNA QUINDLEN

Mother and Child

This is a Mother's Day story about a drug with a tongue-twister name.

It's called diethylstilbestrol, or DES. Those of us who were affected by it were Flavor-of-the-Month about 20 years ago, when doctors discovered that the synthetic estrogen given to millions of women to prevent miscarriage caused vaginal cancer in some of their female offspring.

A woman who wanted to have a healthy baby was given a drug that eventually gave that baby cancer and maybe made that baby incapable of having babies of her own. Or made her have miscarriage after miscarriage, or tubal pregnancies, or premature labors.

Interest in this came and went. There weren't as many cancer cases as originally feared: an estimated one out of every thousand DES-exposed daughters gets clear cell cancer. In a visual age, these are not visual problems, like those wrought by thalidomide. They are hidden, unspoken. A 17-year-old who has had a radical hysterectomy will have a difficult time discussing it.

"Silent mutations hidden beneath sweaters and Levis," Darci Picoult calls the effects of DES. Darci's an actress and a DES daughter, too, and she's written a one-woman show that is very sad and very funny. She plays the pompous doctors, the chirpy nurses, the inquisitorial lawyers, and Ma, a tough, smoky-voiced lady who had twin girls in 1956: "After two miscarriages, I kissed the doctor."

Darci found out she had a problem when, as she yelps onstage, at age 12 she discovered "a thingamajigee on my thingamajigee." The play is called what she called that place as a kid: "My Virginia." Over the years her treatment has included several minor surgeries and plenty of biopsies.

The legacy and lesson of DES.

She's been luckier than Julie, a friend she portrays in the show with a robust Texas twang. At age 23, Julie learned she had cancer. In the play, a doctor deals with her distress about losing her vagina by saying, "Look at me — I'm in my 50's and I've lived my whole life without one."

When Julie decides to sue the drug companies, the lawyers ask her about everything from her sex life to her makeup. "I can't help thinking that if mascara is linked to vaginal cancer, we are all in big trouble," she remarks. Nine years after her radical hysterectomy her cancer came back.

No one knows how many reoccurrences there will be. No one knows what effect the hormonal shifts of menopause will have on those in their 40's. No one knows all the implications for DES sons, although doctors have found abnormalities in their reproductive systems, too. It is clear that DES daughters are at high risk for "unfavorable pregnancy outcomes." The irony is that DES didn't even work; it didn't prevent miscarriage, but now it causes it.

Other medical disasters have taken the place of this one. Margaret Lee Braun, director of the DES Cancer Network, told a hearing at the National Institutes of Health that DES was "a classic example of a research topic that has lost status while there is still scientific reason to investigate."

Darci says a researcher told her there were two problems with a study on suspected immune-system problems: the funding ran out and all the rats exposed to DES died.

My mother took DES and all I had were cell changes that some doctors called precancerous, although I wished they wouldn't. Research shows a higher rate of breast cancer in women who took DES. And I'll always wonder whether it caused my mother's ovarian cancer.

Most doctors say no, but we're not good at trusting doctors; our care rests with the same group of professionals who got us into this mess. The drug companies, true to form, still insist that DES is safe, even though it caused cancer in animals while it was being prescribed for pregnant women. Maybe the companies really believe it was eye makeup that killed the woman Darci calls Julie in the play. Because she did die, at age 34.

The mothers who took this drug often blame themselves as they watch their daughters worry, suffer, die. They never should. Being a mother is a hard job and you have to forgive yourself for the things that seemed okay but turned out wrong somehow. "Before Julie let go," Darci says, "she told me how wonderful it was to spend the last two weeks of her life with her mother, to talk and say everything that hadn't been said." Today of all days, that seems a good way to end. □

Where motherhood kills.

World infant mortality rates are shocking enough.

But there's a hidden story of sorrow and pain.

Women killed by perpetual pregnancy.

Half a million women every year, five million every decade, 99% of them in the world's poorest regions, are dying from pregnancies that are too early, too close together, too many, or too late.

These women's deaths are almost entirely preventable.

In one Latin American nation, safer abortion and better access to birth control helped reduce maternal deaths by 60%.

Yet the Vatican is actually promoting policies that make women's lives worse.

1991: Pope John Paul II calls Brazil's family planning programs "gravely illicit" and says couples can solve that nation's shortage of priests by having more children.

MICHAEL GIBBS

As long as the Vatican opposes contraception and safe abortion, millions of women don't have a prayer.

1992: The Pope says contraception is a "sign of serious moral degradation."

1993: The Vatican again endorses only one family planning method — periodic abstinence — and declares "The Holy See is opposed to all forms of voluntary abortion."

As UN leaders convene in New York this week to plan the 1994 International Conference on Population and Development, it will be tragic if the Vatican's Permanent Observer Mission at the UN blocks global efforts to give more women the ability to protect themselves and their children.

It's time for the Pope and the bishops to listen to women.

This Mother's Day, more than 1,300 women will die from pregnancy-related causes. Our concern for them is a concern for life.

This Blessed Plot, This Glitzy Mall, This England

Planners and preservationists grouse that rural areas look too American.

By WILLIAM E. SCHMIDT

WEST THURROCK, England

IT rises like a pastel apparition from the surrounding English countryside, more than 1.35 million square feet of landscaped atriums, shops, fast-food restaurants, movie theaters, fountains and bubble elevators, all of it under a single roof topped by glass domes and surrounded by 9,000 parking places. The Lakeside Centre is metropolitan London's largest shopping mall, a two-year-old retailing fortress set among the rolling hills of far Essex, 17 miles east of central London. On its busiest weeks, it will draw as many as 350,000 shoppers and 175,000 automobiles, and cause traffic on the nearby London beltway to back up for miles in both directions.

More than three decades after the push toward the suburbs remade America's cities, and introduced the shopping mall as the permanent alternative to Main Street, the last 10 years have seen British retailers mount their own invasion of the shires and sleepy hamlets beyond London, Birmingham and other cities.

Developers were abetted by the aggressive philosophy of deregulation espoused by Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher, whose disciples loosened the viselike controls of local planning authorities in the name of competition and free commerce. Since the mid-1980's they have opened five regional malls similar to Lakeside and built more than 250 smaller retail clusters of outlet stores, mega-supermarkets and discount warehouses amid green hills and pastures once crossed only by hedgerows. According to one survey, the new suburban and exurban centers now claim more than 17 percent of the British retail market in 1991, a more than threefold increase in less than 10 years.

But with Britain's economic malaise blunting the zeal of property developers, a growing number of government planners, rural preservationists and even retailers have pressed their own counteroffensive to roll back what they describe as the Americanization of England's countryside.

"They suck the vitality out of the city at the same time they exacerbate the process of out-of-town sprawl," said Tony Burton, a senior planner for the Council for the Protection of Rural England, who believes that the projects have not only scarred the countryside, but also depreciated the urban areas as well. "This small island of Britain cannot be turned into America, because we don't have the space to waste which you do."

Cars and Fumes

Responding to concerns that such sprawl was exacting a toll not only on the country's landscape, but its cultural and economic heritage as well, the environment and transportation departments have published new planning guidelines that focus the attention of developers and shoppers on Britain's aging town centers.

At the heart of the guidelines — which the Government hopes to implement later this year — is a determination to emphasize traditional retail patterns, many of which are served by public transportation, over new "out-of-town" development, which is far more dependent on the private automobile. The guidelines' sponsors argue that this plan will reduce both fuel consumption and harmful automobile emissions by 10 to 15 percent over the next 25 years. The policy will also reaffirm the country's commitment to long-standing land use and settlement patterns, which feature highly compact, densely settled urban centers surrounded by mostly open green belts, where both commercial and residential development has been cautiously restricted.

Lakeside's 380 stores have dealt a blow to the local High Streets — the British equivalent of Main Street — in nearby Basildon and Dagenham. Mr. Burton asserts that cookie-cutter malls, retail parks and discount warehouses are also eroding the singularity of Britain's landscape. "We are losing the sense of place and local character that we all cherish and believe has made the British countryside so special," he said.

Lakeside is a clone of a suburban American complex, with two McDonalds, Sam Goody and The Gap. Two theme restaurants, a mock riverboat called Old Orleans and a Chicago-style speakeasy named Capone's, overlook a lake that was once a gravel quarry.

Following Europe's Lead

In recent years, even some retailers have questioned the rush to the suburbs, warning that by overdeveloping outside the cities, merchants and chain stores were robbing themselves of business in town. Ross L. Davies, a professor at Oxford's Templeton College and director of the Oxford Institute of Retail Management, said retailers, far from wanting the Government to proscribe such development, want it to urge local governments to measure more carefully the impact of a proposed development on existing retail patterns.

Europe, which flirted briefly with the idea of suburban retail development in the 1970's, decided to tighten its own planning regulations to concentrate on town centers. "That we are shifting back now too reflects thinking across the European Community, particularly in regard to automobiles," Mr. Davies said. "The overall feeling is that we've got to shift people to public transportation, and to achieve that we must reduce urban sprawl and emphasize existing routes."

This does not mean that the Government will bar large-scale outlying projects any time soon. Outside Manchester, developers say they intend to go forward with plans for a 300-acre complex on the city's outskirts, despite complaints from local governments that it will rob local towns of retail business and add to traffic congestion and pollution.

To the developers, the heart of the matter is satisfying consumer demands, not the abstract notions of planners. "Once people have gotten used to the idea of free parking, discounted prices, wide selection and climate-controlled shopping, the High Street just doesn't look the same anymore," said Brian Lucas, the manager of Lakeside.

With 380 stores, the Lakeside Centre shopping mall, left, in Essex, 15 miles east of central London, has dealt a blow to retailers on the High Streets of nearby towns, including Dagenham, bottom.

Crime in Russia Grows; Some Targets Tourists

Moscow

Crime is on the rise in Russia, as it is in all of the post-Communist states, and foreign tourists, once cosseted and controlled by the Soviet state tourist agency, Intourist, are on their own now. Police statistics from 1992 show overall crime up more than 30 percent over 1991. In the first six months of 1992, the Moscow police reported 492 thefts in which foreigners were victims.

Many Russians, not yet inured to the idea of pickpockets and break-ins, tend to exaggerate the threat, but tourists are advised to take the same kinds of precautions they would take in any large American city, starting from the moment they land at Sheremetyevo, Moscow's international airport.

It is not unheard of for luggage to be stolen at Sheremetyevo or for items to be expertly lifted out of unlocked bags. But this happens mostly to visitors on their way out of the country, when a complaint is less likely to be lodged. On arrival, the first hurdle is finding a taxi driver who will take you to a downtown hotel for something less than the average monthly Russian salary (just under $40, and you will be asked for dollars, not rubles).

Some Moscow hotels, particularly the new five-stars, have their own security guards, but it is still advisable to watch for hotel thieves. This is particularly true in hotels that continue to employ the once-ubiquitous key ladies (dezhurnaya in Russian) on each floor, who will insist on keeping your key, in return for a hotel pass. Since these women often leave the keys untended, tourists should never leave valuables in their rooms but put them in hotel safes whenever possible.

Once out on the street, tourists are fair game for petty criminals, like the small bands of beggar children who swarm about their unsuspecting victim before reaching into a pocket or purse. Money changers, offering high exchange rates, may hand a tourist a kukla, or doll, as a packet of fake or even blank rubles is called in street jargon. Walking alone at night through downtown Moscow is not advisable, but actual muggings are rare. Still, visitors who flag down one of the private cars that serve as the city's free-floating taxi fleet should be on their guard (avoiding, for instance, cars with passengers already inside). CELESTINE BOHLEN

Talk and Dance At Spoleto

Two new events will be included in this year's Spoleto Festival in Charleston, S.C., which opens May 28.

"Conversation With . . . ," a series of informal afternoon interviews at the Dock Street Theater, begins June 1 with Ginger Rogers, followed by dialogues with the choreographer Murray Louis on June 2, the novelist Josephine Humphreys on June 7 and Gian Carlo Menotti, the festival's founder, on June 8. Tickets: $15.

Also new this year is a series of late-night cabaret performances on Friday and Saturday at 11:30 in Louis's Charleston Grill at the Omni Charleston Place Hotel. Performers include the pop singer Margaret Whiting and the tenor Robert White. Tickets ($20 and $25) do not include food or drinks.

The 17-day Spoleto Festival, now in its 17th year, will comprise 118 visual and performing arts presentations. Among the other highlights:

"The Singing Child," a one-act opera composed and directed by Gian Carlo Menotti, will have its world premiere. Tickets for the premiere performance on May 31 at the Albert Simons Center are $75; the seven additional performances are $45.

A performance of Martha Graham's last work, "Maple Leaf Rag," and a revival of her 1935 dance "Panorama" are scheduled at the Gaillard Municipal Auditorium May 30 to June 1. Tickets: $10 to $45.

A presentation of Sergei Eisenstein's 1938 film "Alexander Nevsky" will feature Sergei Prokofiev's original score performed live by the Greenville Symphony Orchestra and the Charleston Symphony Singers' Guild. June 12 at 8 P.M. and June 13 at 2 P.M., Gaillard Municipal Auditorium. Tickets: $10 to $35.

Schedules are available from the Spoleto Festival, Post Office Box 157, Charleston, S.C. 29402, (803) 722-2764. Tickets may be purchased at the box office (14 George Street), by mail or by telephone (at least 24 hours before an event), (800) 255-4659.

Political Sculpture Alfresco In Upstate New York

The Storm King Art Center in Mountainville, N.Y., will show new work by the sculptor Siah Armajani as part of its annual sculpture exhibition, which opens May 15 and runs through Oct. 31. Situated 55 miles north of New York City, the center features more than 100 postwar-era outdoor sculptures on 400 acres of fields. Sculptors represented include David Smith, Henry Moore, Alexander Calder and Isamu Noguchi. There is also an indoor collection.

The centerpiece of this year's exhibition, commissioned by the center, is Mr. Armajani's "Gazebo for Two Anarchists: Gabriella Antolini and Alberto Antolini," two 10-foot-high steel gazebos, each containing a wooden chair and a bird cage, connected by a walking bridge. The latest in a series, the piece is a tribute to two Italian-American political dissenters from Connecticut who were active in the early part of this century. Other recent works by the artist will be on view, including indoor sculptures and mixed-media collages.

Also on display will be four cedar sculptures by Ursula von Rydingsvard and a new work by Nam June Paik.

Tour Marks Rescue of Jews

On Oct. 1, 1943 — Rosh ha-Shanah, the start of the Jewish New Year — Nazis raided synagogues and homes in Denmark, intent on rounding up the country's 7,800 Jews and sending them to concentration camps. But they did not find them. The Jews had been hidden by Danes in homes, farms and churches, then ferried across the Oresund Strait to safety in neutral Sweden.

For the 50th anniversary of the rescue, Friends of Scandinavia Tours is offering two-week tours this summer retracing the rescue routes and offering participants a chance to meet people who helped hide and transport the Jews, and some of the rescued Jews who now live in Stockholm, Oslo and Helsinki.

The itinerary, designed by the grandson of a survivor, includes the Great Synagogue and the Resistance Museum in Copenhagen, Danish fishing villages, mountains and fjords around Oslo, the medieval Old Town and the Adas Jeshurun synagogue in Stockholm, two overnight cruises and a day trip to Helsinki.

There are six departures between June 16 and Aug. 28. The tour, including air fare, is $2,588 a person, double occupancy. The company also offers weeklong trips in October. Information: (212) 751-4999.

Smoking Ban By Amtrak

Amtrak has banned smoking on all Northeast Corridor and Empire Corridor trains with scheduled running time of less than four and a half hours. The Northeast Corridor trains affected include the Metroliner between Washington and New York, the New England Express between Boston and New York, and all conventional unreserved short-distance trains. The Empire Corridor service includes trains between New York and Albany and New York and Schenectady. Trains like the Washington-Boston service that operates via New York will continue to allow smoking on designated cars.

The ban follows an experiment last fall prohibiting smoking on unreserved Empire Corridor trains. While Amtrak has no plans to eliminate smoking on all trains, Howard Robertson, a spokesman for the company, noted that "the demand for nonsmoking is higher than the demand for smoking."

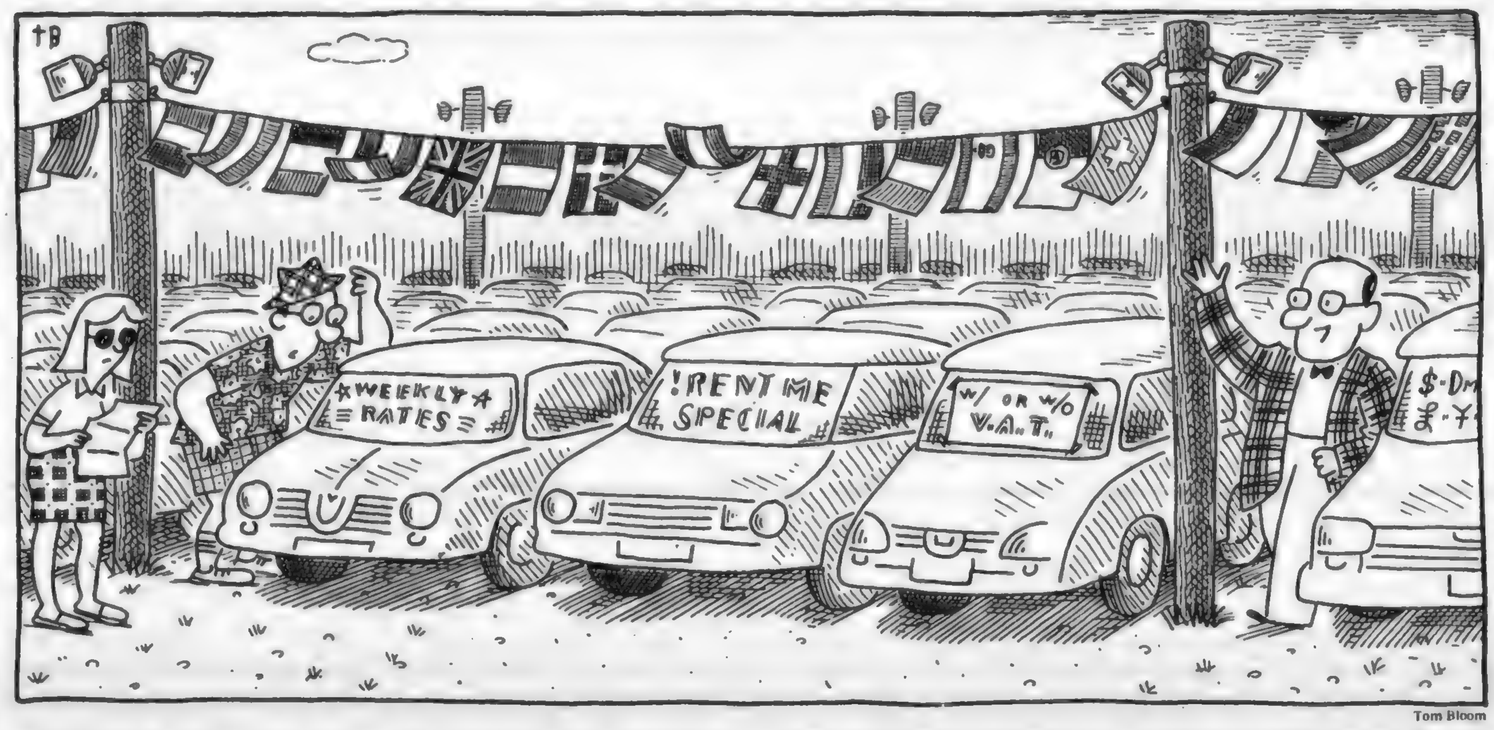
Figuring the Cost of Car Rentals in Europe

By JOHN BRANNON ALBRIGHT



Tom Bloom

IF you think air fares are confusing, wait till you contemplate renting a car in Europe. Not only are there a multitude of variables to consider (type of transmission, mileage allowance, insurance coverage, taxes, car size and currency exchange), but there are also such questions as whether to make a reservation, whether to prepay, whether to pay a surcharge for the convenience of picking up the car at the airport and whether to choose longer-term leasing over short-term renting.

Even a survey of only three major rental companies with headquarters in the United States — Avis, Hertz and National — opens a can of worms. The companies were asked to supply details on the countries where a visitor to western Europe would be most likely to find the least-expensive economy cars for one week in the summer season and, for comparison, the cost of upgrading to the least-expensive car with automatic transmission. Only two of the three companies gave a breakdown of basic rates and rates with the collision-damage waiver (C.D.W.). Avis offered rates as an inclusive package with unlimited mileage, waiver and tax, or as an exclusive package with unlimited mileage only. All three offered unlimited mileage with a weekly rental; not all do for a one-day rental.

The C.D.W. Factor

As most people who have rented cars in the United States know, one complicating factor is the collision-damage waiver (C.D.W.), which is not actually true insurance. The car-rental companies are not selling a policy; they are collecting an extra fee for offering to forgive the cost of any damage. Like the basic car rental rates, the C.D.W. fee can be as much or as little as the traffic will bear.

Most major credit-card companies now offer coverage to protect cardholders who decline C.D.W.'s, but it is wise to make sure that the type of card being used has such a feature before deciding that the price of the the waiver — typically $10 to $20 a day — will not be a factor in figuring the final cost.

Because all three companies surveyed said that Americans would pay the least if they reserved a car before leaving the United States, packages requiring reservations were used for the following comparison. Avis cited two packages: Super Value, which sounded as if it would be the cheaper, and Discover Europe, which turned out to be the better deal. The name of the Hertz package is Affordable Europe, and the National package is called European Advansaver.

A driver considering either of the Avis plans must make a reservation in North America. For the Discover Europe rate, the reservation must be made at least 14 days before picking up the car; for the Super Value rate, the reservation must be made 48 hours in advance. In both cases, the caller will be quoted a rate in dollars based on the prevailing rate in the country and the exchange rate in effect on the day of the call. But the traveler will not have to prepay. The actual price may vary, however, because of a change in exchange rates by the time the car is picked up. The dollar amount may also be affected by the exchange rate in effect when the final cash or credit-card transaction is completed.

Like the least expensive Avis plan, the cheapest Hertz package also requires a reservation at least 14 days ahead, but the renter must prepay at the time of reserving. The price will be the rate prevailing in local currency on the day of the reservation, converted to dollars at that day's exchange rate.

The National plan also requires a reservation at least 14 days in advance and prepayment at the prevailing local currency rate, converted to dollars at the exchange rate in effect when the reservation is made.

All three companies charge a $50 fee if a reservation is canceled. Hertz also charges a $50 fee if changes are made in a reservation after 48 hours of the original reservation.

Here is how the rates for the three companies compared in late April for a car to be used this summer:

Avis said its least expensive economy-size car (a size above mini, which is generally regarded as too small for extensive travel) was a Volkswagen Polo with manual transmission for $257 in Germany. That rate included the C.D.W. and value added tax (V.A.T.) of 15 percent. Without the waiver, but with tax, it was $143. The next-cheapest Avis car was an Opel Corsa for $269 in Portugal, including the waiver and tax. With tax only, it was $253. Hertz said its least expensive economy-size car was a Ford Fiesta (manual) for $215, including C.D.W. and 16 percent V.A.T., in Portugal — but available at that rate only through June 30 and from Oct. 1 through March 31. Without the waiver, but with tax, it was $158. The rate from July 1 through Sept. 30 was $270 with waiver and tax, $253 with tax only. Hertz offers a Ford Fiesta in Belgium with waiver and 19.5 percent V.A.T. at the same price, $270. With tax but without waiver, the price was only $180.

National said its least expensive economy-size car was a Renault Clio (manual) for $223 in Britain. The rate included C.D.W. and V.A.T. of 17.5 percent. With tax only, it was $175. National's rates for a Renault Clio in Portugal through June 31 were $269 with waiver and tax, $180 with tax only. The rates from July 1 through Sept. 30 were $288 with waiver and tax, $220 with tax only.

Travelers who require automatic transmission pay a premium. To upgrade to the least-expensive class with automatic, the comparison showed that Avis would rent a VW Golf in Germany for $474, including C.D.W. and V.A.T. Without the waiver but with tax, it was $336. In Portugal, the Avis rates for an automatic (VW Vento) were $644 with waiver and tax, $588 with tax alone.

The Hertz rates for an automatic (Ford Sierra) in Belgium were $515 with C.D.W. and V.A.T., $378 with tax only. In Portugal rates for an automatic (Ford Orion) in the low season were $573 with waiver and tax, $501 with tax alone. In high season the rates were $645 with waiver and tax, $573 with tax alone.

National's rates for a Renault 19 with automatic in Britain were $354 with C.D.W. and V.A.T., $294 with tax alone. National's low-season rates for an automatic in Portugal (Renault 19) were $488 with waiver and tax, $454 with tax alone. In high season, the rates were $628 and $594, respectively.

One thing to keep in mind about automatics in Europe is that not all rental locations carry midsize or compact models, which means that the driver who insists on an automatic may have to rent a full-size car at much higher rates.

Variables Affecting Rates

Another point to consider is that rates are subject to change. During research for this article, a call was made to Avis for more information, and it was learned that some rates had changed in just two weeks. "All rates are subject to change," the spokeswoman said.

Another factor that will throw off comparison shopping is surcharges at some airports. Austria imposes a 7 percent charge on the total bill. The charge in Brussels is 9 percent, in Italy 10 percent and in Switzerland 6 percent. A flat fee of about $6 is in effect in Germany and about $8 in Amsterdam. Renters wishing to avoid the surcharge will have to pick up their cars at downtown offices.

Those needing a car for more than a week are likely to save money by leasing, since longer-term rates are generally lower than weekly rates, especially starting after two weeks. A Ford Fiesta, for example, is offered by Auto Europe in France for $524 for 14 days and $704 for 21 days. The rates include unlimited mileage, C.D.W. and V.A.T. A similar longer-term arrangement, which works like a lease but is called purchase-repurchase, is offered by some manufacturers. Renault, for example, charges $695 for a Clio for 23 days; this includes C.D.W. No tax is required.

Q/A and Q/A

Kayaking in the Berkshires

Q. Can you give me the names of kayak rental outfitters in the Berkshires area of Massachusetts? — Iyna Bort, Rockville Centre, L.I.

A. One of the oldest kayak outfitters in Western Massachusetts is the Outdoor Center of New England in Millers Falls, run by Tom Foster, the former chairman of the American Canoe Association's instruction committee. The company rents new touring or recreational kayaks for $35 a day, which includes paddles and life jackets. High-performance whitewater kayaks are also available at $40 a day, but Mr. Foster prefers to rent them only to accomplished paddlers, or students who have completed a clinic at his school. Canoes are $35 a day. Extra gear, such as wetsuits and waterproof booties, are also available for rent. New England rivers run chilly at this time of year, from 30 to 35 degrees, so neoprene wetsuits are mandatory in the spring and a good idea even in summer.

The classes, geared to all levels of paddlers, cost $195 for a full day, or $120 for each of two people. An additional day is $175 for one person and $90 for each of two people. The center, near Greenfield, Mass., is on the Connecticut River, a mile from Millers River, and a half-hour drive from the Deerfield, West and Ashuelot Rivers, all of which offer whitewater rapids. For more information call (413) 659-3926, or write Outdoor Center of New England, 10 Pleasant Street, Millers Falls, Mass. 01349.

Kayak rentals and instruction are also offered by Zoar Outdoor, on the Deerfield River in Charlemont, Mass. The company, which takes its name from the biggest rapids on the Deerfield, the Zoar Gap, offers whitewater and touring kayaks for $35 a day, which includes wetsuits, paddles, life jackets and helmets. Two-day kayak clinics for beginners cost $160 a person. The class covers fundamentals such as paddle strokes, and how to get out of an overtipped kayak. For more information call (800) 532-7483, or (413) 339-4010, or write for a free brochure to Zoar Outdoor, Mohawk Trail, Charlemont, Mass. 01339.

Berkshire Outfitters in Adams, Mass., does not rent kayaks, but does sell new and used whitewater and touring kayaks and gear. Used kayaks sell for $200 and more, and new kayaks from $595 to $2,900. The store also sells vests, paddles, helmets, wetsuits and drysuits. More information, Berkshire Outfitters, Route 8, Adams, Mass. 01220; (413) 743-5900.

For more information about the Berkshires call the Berkshire Visitors Bureau at (800) 237-5747, or write Berkshire Visitors Bureau, Berkshire Common, Pittsfield, Mass. 01201.

Welsh World Choirs

Q. When are the World Choir Concert in Cardiff and the Llangollen International Musical Eisteddfod scheduled to take place? — Shirley W. Mayhew, West Tisbury, Mass.

A. The great Welsh choir tradition will flourish at the second World Choir Concert at Cardiff Arms Park, Cardiff, on May 29. Highlights will include performances by the Welsh-born pop singer Shirley Bassey, the Russian bass Paata Burchuladze, the treble singer Oliver Sammons, the harpist Catrin Finch and the Royal Philharmonic Orchestra. The World Choir itself features 6,500 choristers. Tickets for the concert will cost from $15.40 to $38.50. For information and tickets, call (222) 691999, or fax (222) 520315, or write the World Choir Office, 20 Pantbach Road, Birchgrove, Cardiff CF4 1VA, Wales.

The Llangollen International Musical Eisteddfod, near Wrexham, North Wales, will take place from July 6 to 11. The festival, in its 47th year, will feature youth choirs, children's choirs and all-male and all-female choirs, as well as folk singing and dancing. Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" choral symphony will be performed by the Huddersfield Choral Society accompanied by the BBC Philharmonic Orchestra, with soloists conducted by Yan Pascal Tortelier. For information and bookings, call (978) 860236, fax (978) 861300, or write the International Musical Eisteddfod Office, Llangollen, Clwyd, Wales LL20 8NG.

Libyan Travel Restriction

Q. This June I will be traveling with a British group to North Africa: I know American citizens are not allowed into Libya, but will Libya not admit anyone with an American passport? — Louise Forscher, Bedford, N.Y.

A. It has been illegal since Dec. 11, 1981, for an American to enter Libya on a United States passport. If Libya were to allow entry, American travelers would be subject to a $2,000 fine and imprisonment of up to five years on their return to the United States.

The State Department has a standing travel advisory warning against travel to Libya, because "we still consider travel in Libya to be dangerous," Gary Sheaffer, a State Department spokesman, said. "Americans are still at risk," he added. According to the department's Bureau of Consular Affairs, the decision was made because of "Libya's long history of flouting international law and directing terrorist attacks against United States citizens." Diplomatic relations with Libya were severed in 1979, and the United States removed its diplomats in 1980.

Four categories of people may obtain special validation from the State Department for travel to Libya: professional journalists; Red Cross officials; those who have "compelling humanitarian considerations" to go there, and those considered to be acting in the national interest.

Similar restrictions apply to travel to Lebanon and Iraq.

Updated travel advisories can be heard by calling the State Department's Citizens' Emergency Center at (212) 647-5225. ERIC P. NASH

Corrections

A foreign exchange listing in the Travel Watch column on April 25 misstated the rate for the British pound on April 19. One dollar was worth 63 pence.

In the same column, an air fare listing included a carrier erroneously under the headings "Restricted Fare" and "Unrestricted Fare." The airline, Delta, does not offer service on the Miami-Rio de Janeiro route. (The lowest fares for airlines on this route, on May 3, appear in the column today, on page 21.)

An article on April 18 about Burgos, Spain, misidentified the wife of Alfonso VIII, the Spanish King of Castile from 1158 to 1214. She was Eleanor, daughter of Eleanor of Aquitaine and Henry II of England.

Scouting Honolulu's Real Neighborhoods

Where the Hawaiians go for coffee, flowers and dim sum

By JOCELYN FUJII

NEIGHBORHOODS like Manoa, Moiliili, Kaimuki and Kapahulu, only minutes from Waikiki by car or bus, are often overlooked by visitors to Hawaii, yet these are the areas where Honolulu residents live, work, buy flowers, congregate in coffee houses and order dim sum or Chinese cake noodles from their favorite holes in the wall. An hour from downtown, the North Shore town of Haleiwa, a hideaway for writers, artists, business types and backpackers, also offers surfer cafes, offbeat boutiques and some of the best wave watching around. You won't find expensive mai tais or plastic aloha in any of these places — just a few pleasing, inexpensive places to shop and dine.

JOCELYN FUJII, the author of "Under the Hula Moon," lives in Honolulu.

Manoa

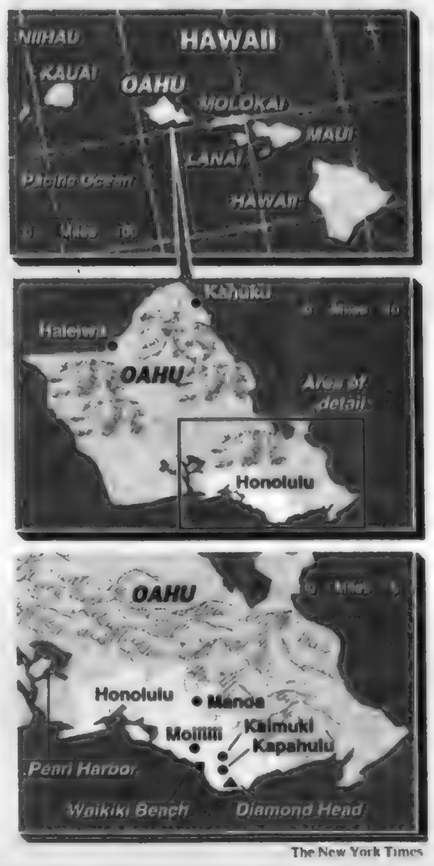
Four miles from downtown Honolulu and mauka (toward the mountain) from the University of Hawaii, Manoa is a green, deep, rainbow-veiled valley framed by the Koolau mountain range. Following a rain, waterfalls gush down the valley walls.

Queen Kashumanu, the wife of Kamehameha I and the most influential of Hawaii's queens, had her favorite retreat in this valley, a cottage with green shutters and green doors. She died there in 1832.

Today in Manoa you can find everything from the island's best chocolates to its most charming bookstore, within a radius of a few hundred yards. In the Manoa Marketplace, basically a large parking lot bordered with stores and restaurants, is the Twin Moons Book Shop. Its friendly and intelligent owners (twins, of course) offer a small, select assortment of books. Visitors browse among arcane and popular titles or among the cards and calendars. Across the parking lot from Twin Moons, the severely hip gather at Coffee Manoa, where they can sip espresso or carrot juice, read The Honolulu Weekly and eat oak cakes, dense scone-shaped pastries made of oats and dates ($1.40 each). If there are waterfalls across the valley that day, you can see them from the outdoor tables.

Across the street, chocolate lovers have their own temple: the Honolulu Chocolate Company. Just a couple of tables indoors and outdoors, and coffee and desserts, including cakes and chocolate-dipped pistachio and whole macadamia nuts. These are made-in-Hawaii chocolates, and you pay for the quality ($16 a pound for the macadamias).

A block away, at Nature's Basket, fresh produce lines the sidewalk under awnings: vine-ripened tomatoes and huge papayas from a North Shore town called Kahuku, mangoes and litchis in season, pineapples, Ka'u oranges (as ugly as they are succulent), bananas, cabbages and lemons. Inside are wholesome and tastily prepared foods from vegetarian chili to tempeh (slightly fermented soybean cake) sandwiches. A tofu casserole costs $3.75.



The New York Times

Moiliili

About halfway between Manoa Valley and Waikiki Beach is Moiliili, checkered with flower shops and old family businesses struggling to survive amid creeping commercial development. Vanished from this old Japanese town are a candy store that also sold mochi, or pounded-rice cakes; a teahouse; a fish market; a church, and other landmarks. But the Moiliili Community Center, with its ornate new thrift shop storefront, is busier than ever with classes, services for the elderly and summer bon dance festivals.

Rudy Ogawa, who grew up in the area, owns Rudy's Flowers, one of Moiliili's busiest niches. Local residents come to Moiliili to buy flowers and leis from shops like Rudy's, where every morning there's a minor traffic jam as people line up for the specials. When ginger plants are abundant, Micronesian ginger leis may sell for as little as $8 here, about half the price of a Waikiki lei.

Next door, Clair de Lune stocks a tasteful hodgepodge: Indonesian money belts, antique lacquer screens, vases from the 1950's and collectible old koa wood furniture. Coconut spoons for $5 and $10 are a good buy, as are the boldly graphic bark cloth cushions ($40 and up) that were popular from the

Crossing the Channel to Eat in Style

Savvy Londoners spend a weekend in France simply to enjoy the glories of the table

The New York Times

By A. ALVAREZ

FOR a weekend of serious eating, sensible Londoners cross the Channel. In London a three-course meal for two, with wine, at a smartish restaurant will set you back $160; at the best places — the Connaught, the Savoy Grill, Le Gavroche — you reckon to pay twice that. If you thought of what it cost, that your restaurant bill for two would feed the whole family for a week, you wouldn't enjoy the meal; you might even find it difficult to swallow.

The French, on the other hand, believe in cooking like the Italians believe in fast cars: as a national glory. They put up statues to great chefs, name streets after them, and consider good food a democratic right, available to everyone, regardless of race, color, creed or social standing. Outside Paris, the mayor and the mailman sit side by side in the best restaurants, tucking in with relish and critically sipping their wine.

Within a couple of years, a tunnel will join Britain to the Continent and going abroad will be just another car journey, the Pas-de-Calais just another dormitory suburb of London. Meanwhile, getting there is still travel in the old-fashioned sense: a drive to the coast, a bustling port, a brief sea-crossing, then another port where the smells are as different as the voices and the culture. In summer, Dover is an inferno: traffic jams going in and coming out, the ferries packed and queues for everything, both on shore and afloat. But in spring and fall, the place is empty, boarding takes a few minutes, the ferries leave on time, and an extra $8 or so buys a seat in the comfortable, spacious Club Class lounge, with a grand view forward and a waiter to bring you free tea or coffee.

We arrived in Calais at 4:30 on a Friday afternoon last fall and were booked into a little hotel just south of Boulogne-sur-Mer, less than 25 miles away. Instead of taking the old main road to Paris, the crowded, ugly N1, we turned right onto the D940, a lovely switchback ride along the coast, through well-kept villages — white houses, red pitched roofs — past wide bays and headlands — Cap Blanc-Nez, Cap Gris-Nez — past lighthouses and the great concrete fortifications built by the Germans against an Allied invasion that never arrived in these parts. The sea was flat as milk and there were more ships out in the busy Channel than cars on the road.

The Hôstellerie de la Rivière sits beside a fast-flowing stream in Pont-de-Briques, an unprepossessing suburb of Boulogne. Its front door opens directly into the bar, its bedrooms are cramped, and to reach them you have to go through the dining room. But the welcome is warm, the service friendly and efficient, and the restaurant — one star in the Michelin — is comfortable and shadowy. We had drinks in the bar and discussed the menu with Jean Martin, le patron. We wanted le menu de dégustation, which is where the chef shows off his skills, but there was a dish à la carte that sounded good. It was a fish stew called la gainée, a local dish that Mr. Martin said he had learned from his grandfather, who was a fisherman. He would cook it for us, he said, as part of the menu and at no extra cost.

It was an elaborate meal, lovingly cooked, tenderly served. The starters were wonderful: a tiny fish and bacon tart amuse-bouche, while we chose a wine, then foie gras that melted in the mouth. But then the curse of the Michelin star — that nouvelle cuisine combination of ambitious ingredients and exotic garnishes served on pretty plates in very small quantities — set in: a warm terrine of Ever think maybe your kids could use a cruise to Bermuda, too?

If you don't think kids face stress too, think back to the last time you had to tell your teacher your dog ate your homework. That's why we designed Celebrity's Meridian Family Cruising Program.

There are supervised programs for the entire family. Beside play sessions for the youngest kids, older children will enjoy juggling, scavenger hunts and face painting. For teens there are our theater workshops, karaoke contests and dances. Plus pool-volleyball and basketball.

And with all the time you'll be saving by not having to drive them to each activity, you can enjoy our three on-deck whirlpools, the exciting casino and world-class entertainment (not including your kid's talent show, of course). Or just relax on deck while you're waited on for a change, by our five-star European-trained staff.

New York to Bermuda. Special Family Rate. $648 per person.

Aside from our gourmet menu orchestrated by internationally acclaimed chef Michel Roux there's our children's menu with a wide variety of entrees including hot dogs and hamburgers.

Quality time with your kids isn't limited to activities on board. In Bermuda you can discover the sights of historic King's Wharf and St. George. Stroll around the shops of Hamilton. Then spend a day on one of Bermuda's 137 pink sand beaches.

Our Meridian family cruises sail on Sundays from late June to early September. And at our special family rate of $648* per person for a family of four, you won't have to cut into your kids' allowances to take them.

So give your travel agent a call. Unless your kids already called.

turbot, pike and scallops was dry and bland and la gainée itself was not quite the hearty peasant dish we expected: cod, turbot, monkfish and fat shrimps, cooked in seawater and surrounded by little mounds of turnip and carrot. It tasted of the sea, fresh and clean, but it was prettier and more meager, I suspect, than anything Mr. Martin's grandfather ever cooked up (the dish has since been removed from the menu). But the cheeses, from Philippe Olivier's great cheese shop in Boulogne, restored our faith and the dessert was a triumph: a crisp, light crepe stuffed with sharp apple, pear and raspberries and surrounded by three sauces — strawberry, black currant, vanilla.

All that for 290 francs apiece (about $60, calculated at 4.84 francs to the dollar), miraculous by London standards. But be warned: French restaurants perform their economic miracles by subsidizing the food with the wine. Our bottle of Puligny-Montrachet cost more than the meal, a hefty $66. There is another side of the equation, however: a rich and subtle wine is made for savoring, so you drink less.

OUR plan was to spend Saturday exploring the area between Boulogne and the Somme. We stopped off first at Samer, which has a slanting, cobbled square and a noble 15th-century church. Then we drove a few miles south to Montreuil, a medieval town perched on a hill and surrounded by brick ramparts. Its chateau is now a famous hotel-restaurant but, even in October, it was booked solid weeks in advance. The town has changed little since the 18th century, and to modern eyes it is charming: narrow streets, begonias around the base of the plane trees in the little central square, grand churches with clocks that chime the hour in unison. It is also full of tourists and smart shops that cater to them. We drank a coffee, watched the tour buses arrive, then left.

The other name for this part of France is Picardie and armies have been fighting over it for almost a thousand years. Agincourt (Azincourt in French), where Henry V and his archers slaughtered 10,000 French soldiers in three hours flat, is 25 miles east of Montreuil, and my wife, a demon map-reader, worked out a lovely route through tiny villages and deep, folded countryside. The approach to the hamlet of Agincourt is hung with medieval-style pennants and cut-out knightly figures; the battlefield itself, a narrow plain between two woods, we saw under gray skies and spitting rain.

We had lunch at Flandres in Hesdin, a dozen miles down the road. The dining room was big and ugly, but an open grill roared away at the rear and the place was full of locals lashing into their food in that peculiarly French way: with gusto, yet critically checking every mouthful.

I had the cheap set meal of regional dishes: flamiche aux poireaux, a creamy quiche with leeks; then cockerel cooked in beer and flambé au genièvre, a local juniper berry liquor, a dish that was strong-tasting and heart-warming; finally, good apple tart. My wife had delicious scallops cooked with wild mushrooms, ominously called trompettes de la mort, then a perfect andouillette, which came with salad and French fries, then an ice cream. With coffee and a half-bottle of excellent claret, the meal for two cost not much more than our previous night's wine. The food was faultless in its traditional way — strong, simple, lavish, cheap — yet Michelin gives Les Flandres a minimal rating, and not for its cooking, only as a hotel. It seemed absurd.

Photographs by Jill Hartley

LEFT Montreuil has changed little since the 18th century.

Twenty miles southwest is Crécy, where, in 1346, Edward III's archers took on a much larger French army and wiped them out with almost no English casualties. We admired the sweeping, open battlefield from a wooden tower built on the site of the mill from which the King had watched his troops, then drove on through the ancient, misty forest of Crécy to Le Crotoy at the mouth of the Somme, where the landscape flattens out, widens, becomes marshy.

The promenade at Le Crotoy has a view of the estuary: elderly boats tilted on the mud, seagulls fishing for their supper, the far shore a pencil mark on the horizon. The houses lining it are shabby and shuttered, the kind Utrillo painted,and there is a statue of Joan of Arc, who was imprisoned there, shaded by plane trees.

North from Le Crotoy to Boulogne is La Côte d'Opale, a string of seaside towns with wide beaches in front, golf courses behind. We drove straight to Le Touquet, which was once the most fashionable watering hole in France and is still a town of splendid villas, grand hotels, pine trees and outrageously expensive shops. A friend had recommended "a monument of 50's schlock," a hotel called L'Atlantique at Wimereux, just north of Boulogne. So we strolled on Le Touquet's magnificent, blowy beach, inspected the suave boutiques and drove on.

It was dark by the time we reached Wimereux. As promised, the hotel was a symphony of marble, plastic, bamboo and piped Muzak but — unimaginable in France — the reception was sullen and uninterested and they had booked a different kind of room from the one I had reserved by telephone from London. So we picked up our bags and left. Boulogne is a couple of miles down the road, we thought; plenty of hotels there.

But it was a Saturday night, the town was full, and we finished up in a pleasant but basic hotel, where the bedroom smelled of plumbing. It was like being a student again. But at least they were pleased to see us.

To make up for the disappointment, we splurged at La Matelote, which is plush and pretty and the only Michelin star in town. After our big lunch, neither of us could handle a four-course set menu, so we ate à la carte. My wife had the chef's specialties of the day: slices of warm pigeon, pink and tender, on a clean-tasting salad, followed by lobster in a delicate basil sauce.

I began with scallops au gratin, a beautiful dish — the sauce sharpened with finely chopped shallots and the scallops so fresh and perfectly cooked that they melted in my mouth like a mariné version of butter. I followed that with a plain baked lobster, which came with two sauces. It was a classic meal, without a whiff of nouvelle cuisine, and it redeemed what had promised to be a disastrous evening. France, in fact, is the only country I know where that kind of transformation can be guaranteed. But it doesn't come cheap. With aperitifs, a bottle of Meursault, coffee and digestifs, the meal, at $282, cost more than our whole night at Pont-de-Briques — room, dinner, breakfast, Puligny-Montrachet and all. The tastes may have been French and immaculate, but the aftertaste was London and sour (although we did order some of the most expensive dishes on the menu).

THE next morning we wandered around Boulogne for an hour, then drove back to Calais the way we had come, by the sweeping, empty coast road. It was Sunday and mussel-gatherers were out on the wide beaches, couples walked their dogs, a big wind blew over the sand dunes, the breakers thundered in. In Calais we ate a farewell lunch at Le Channel, one of my favorite restaurants. Michelin gives Le Channel what I now think is its supreme accolade, a red "R," signifying "restaurants serving good food at reasonable prices." Le Channel is where the locals go for a meal out, a big, comfortable place with a kitchen behind a glass panel at the back of the dining room, from which the chef, a serious man with a droopy gray mustache, greets his customers solemnly as they pass.

The cheerful waiters bring plates of small fresh shrimps called crevettes bouquet to keep you going while you study the menu; the bountiful set lunch — and by no means the cheapest — cost a mere $40. For that my wife had foie gras and smoked giblets, while I waded into a vast plate of smoked fish — salmon, whitefish, sprats, peppered mackerel — with asparagus. After that, we both had Dover sole meunière — the best fish in the world and straight from the English Channel — and excellent cheese. The desserts were indifferent, but otherwise it was everything I want now from a meal out: first-class ingredients, reasonably priced and lovingly cooked.

We got back onto the ferry several pounds heavier than when we had arrived 48 hours earlier, but perfectly content. Next time London and its prices get to us, we decided, we'll take a train to Dover, buy two cheap day tickets to Calais, walk to Le Channel to work up an appetite, eat like kings and waddle back to London — all for what it would cost us to dine out around the corner. ■

By NATHANIEL C. NASH

It is a typical afternoon in the Recoleta neighborhood of Buenos Aires. In the plaza facing Pilar Church, a somewhat ragtag, 50-ish couple is dancing a sultry tango, accompanied by a lone accordion player. Dozens of people look on, some joining in the dance.

A few feet away, groups of porteños, as residents of the capital are called, are sitting around tables, sipping espresso. Most are dressed in designer jeans and sweatshirts. Their children play in the shadow of a huge gomero, or rubber tree.

Few places in Latin America offer a greater sense of urban well-being than Buenos Aires. And an afternoon at the Recoleta is perhaps the best way to experience it.

Unlike most American cities, the center of Buenos Aires is residential, home to the upper and upper-middle classes. Argentines stroll along the streets late into the night with little fear of harm. And though the city has become relatively expensive, and the antiques, leather goods, furs and shoes are no longer bargains, it is still a place of rich European-Latin culture, good food, fine architecture, restful parks and plazas.

Events

Among the many attractions offered by Buenos Aires, the magnificent gilded Colón Theater, 1111 Tucumán (telephone 35-5414), should not be missed. Musicians say the acoustics make it one of the finest concert halls in the world. On May 18, 21, 23, 26 and 29 and June 1, the Colón Orchestra with a cast of singers from the Colón Opera Company and abroad will perform Rossini's opera "La Cenerentola" with Stuart Bedford and Julio Malaval alternating as conductor. On June 8, 11, 13 and 17, there will be a program of two operas: Tchaikovsky's "Yolanta," with a cast of Russian singers and members of the Colón Opera Company, conducted by Bruno Astoli, and "Guayaquil," composed and conducted by Mario Perusso. On July 13 to 18, Julio Bocca will be dancing "The Taming of the Shrew" with Colón's ballet company and orchestra. Tickets for concerts are $4 to $20; operas, $20 to $100; ballets, $10 to $60 (prices calculated at 1 peso to the dollar).

For those who understand a little Spanish, "Brujas" ("Witches"), at the Teatro Ateneo, 918 Paraguay (311-2888), is worth an evening. Tickets for the comedy — about six women, once high-school chums — are $15 to $25. Shows nightly except Monday.

A soccer game here is both a cultural and sporting event. The largest stadium is River Plate, 7597 Figueroa Alcorta (788-1186), in the Núñez neighborhood, three miles north of the center. The stadium in the barrio of La Boca, known as "Bombonera," 805 Brandsen (362-2050), where the Boca Juniors team plays, has a rowdier crowd, but the heat of the Argentine spirit is felt more intensely. There is at least one game at one of the stadiums every weekend. General admission is $8. Reserved seats at River Plate are $50; special V.I.P. seats recommended for tourists are $80. Reserved seats at Bombonera are $30 to $40.

The Argentine Rural Society's Annual Fair is held from July 29 to Aug. 18 at the society's Palermo headquarters on Juncal and Oro. Throngs crowd the premises to catch a glimpse of the huge bulls, cows, pigs, sheep and horses for which Argentina is famous. This fiesta celebrates gaucho and farm life with folkloric dancing and singing. Tickets will probably be about $5. Open Sunday through Thursday 9 A.M to 8 P.M., Friday and Saturday 9 A.M. to 9 P.M. Call 322-3491 or 322-3531 for information.

Sightseeing

Buenos Aires is a walking city, full of parks, wide boulevards and narrow lanes filled with turn-of-the-century architecture. Some of its greatest assets are its plazas. The Plaza Dorrego in San Telmo is the city's antiques center, and every Sunday vendors of old toys, post cards, brass lamps and gaucho paraphernalia, along with struggling artists, set up little stands and hawk their goods.

There are also dozens of antiques shops around the plaza. Well worth a visit is the silversmith shop of Juan Carlos Pallarols, 1094 Defensa (361-7360), head of a family that has been working in silver since 1804.

The Plaza San Martín is a near botanical garden of giant trees: the gomero; the blue flowering jacaranda; the palo borracho, or bottle tree; the tipa, and a variety of palms. In the Plaza de Mayo, opposite the presidential palace (Casa Rosada), every Thursday at 3 P.M. women known as the Madres de Plaza de Mayo don white scarfs and silently walk around the plaza. They are protesting the disappearance of their children, victims of the military dictatorship that ruled between 1976 and 1983.

From the plaza, one could go north to the vast (and safe) Palermo Park and visit the Japanese Gardens. They are open Monday through Friday 10 A.M. to 6 P.M., Saturday and Sunday 10 A.M. to 6:30 P.M. Admission is $1. Adjacent to the park and facing Plaza Italia on Avenida Las Heras and Sarmiento is the Buenos Aires Zoo. Open Tuesday through Sunday 9:30 A.M. to 6:30 P.M. Admission, $3. Across from the zoo are the Botanical Gardens, which date from 1898 and house over 6,000 plant species. Open daily from 8 A.M. to 6 P.M. Free admission.

The Fine Arts Museum, 1473 Avenida del Libertador (803-0802), contains the country's largest art collection. The museum is open Tuesday through Sunday, 1:30 to 7:30 P.M. (Saturday, 9 A.M. to 7:30 P.M.); admission is $1. The museum will exhibit two Argentine artists who painted the city at the beginning of the century, Carlos Torrallardona (May 12 to June 8) and Alfredo Lazzari (May 15 to June 20).

The Museum of Decorative Arts, 1902 Avenida del Libertador (801-8248), has an impressive collection of antique furnishings, musical instruments, silver and weapons from the 16th through 19th centuries.

The museum itself is an elegantly ornate mansion, with a Louis XIV salon and Renaissance hall. The second floor houses an Oriental art collection. Open 3 to 7 P.M., except Tuesday and Sunday; admission, $1.

Where to Stay

The Hotel Plaza Francia, 2189 Schiaffino (804-9631), is conveniently situated opposite the Fine Arts Museum near the Recoleta. Its small but attractive rooms overlook the plaza. A double room is $125. (Prices here and below include breakfast and an 18 percent V.A.T.)

The Hotel Lafayette, in the heart of the financial district at 546 Reconquista (393-9081), offers unpretentious yet spacious rooms and excellent service. A double room: $125.

Budget: A favorite among Argentine estancia owners is the Dorá, 963 Maipú (312-7391), near the Plaza San Martín. Conveniently situated, the hotel offers simple yet adequate accommodations. A double room is $98.

The Hotel Wilton Palace, 1162 Avenida Callao (811-8816), is a family-oriented hotel in a busy shopping area. A double room is $78 (breakfast is not included).

Luxury: The Hyatt, 1086 Posadas (326-5920 or 326-1234), recently completed, is an elegant hotel with marble floors, modern rooms and two of the best restaurants in the city: a luncheon room, off the main lobby, which serves Venetian cuisine, and a formal dining room at the Maison, which features French cuisine. A double room is $348.

The Alvear, 1891 Avenida Alvear (804-4031), has recently been refurbished, and much of the original Art Deco decoration has been retained. A double room costs $348.

Where to Eat

Argentina is the place for those who love beef — there are restaurants called parrilladas that specialize in beef. One of the best is Los Años Locos (784-8681), along the riverfront, right off the corner of Avenida Costanera Norte and Pampa, some 10 minutes from the city center. One might start with grilled provolone cheese smothered in oil and oregano, then have the salad of tomatoes and watercress, and follow with the huge steak called bife de chorizo, or the ribs, called tira de asado, and french fries. With steak, Argentines like the reasonably priced red wine Bianchi Borgoña, or a clericot, a mixture of white wine, fruit, sugar and ice. The price for two should be about $60.

Another good parrillada, in the same price range, is La Estancia, at 941 Lavalle (326-0025).

Of the several good French restaurants, Catalinas, at 875 Reconquista (313-0182 or 313-8430), is small and intimate, with top-quality service. The $40 special includes a choice of appetizer, salad, main course and dessert, plus Champagne and white and red wine — probably the best value in the city. Closed Saturday at midday and all day Sunday.

At Calle de Angeles, 318 Chile (361-3633), designed by the set crew of the Colón Theater, diners sit in what appears to be a narrow old colonial street in San Telmo, with ironwork balconies and 10-foot-high doors. A harpist plays most nights. This restaurant has good lamb, fish and beef and fairly priced wine. A dinner for two costs about $120. Closed Sunday.

Much of the Buenos Aires population is of Italian ancestry, and the pastas and other Italian specialties here are first-rate. Ligure, 855 Juncal (393-0644), is a traditional Argentine establishment, where waiters in white jackets memorize the orders, the tables are close, the conversation is loud and the food is abundant and good. A hearty Latin stew called puchero is superb. With wine, a meal for two costs about $100.

Broccolino, 776 Esmeralda (322-7754 or 322-7652), serves fresh, spicy pastas and rabas, or fried squid. With an appetizer, pasta, dessert and bottle of wine, the cost for two is $60.

One should not leave Buenos Aires without taking time to enjoy the sidewalk cafes at the Recoleta and along 9th of July Avenue, as well as the tradition of teatime, a reflection of the British influence on the city.

At the 1912 El Molino Café, on the corner of Rivadavia and Callao, the belle époque décor has faded, the porcelain and marble fittings are unpolished and the mosaic lanterns broken, but the glory of the past can still be experienced. Tea or coffee with a choice of four pastries is $6.

Other cafes that maintain the old style are Café Tortoni, 825 Avenida de Mayo, and Café Petit Paris, right opposite the Plaza San Martín at 774 Avenida Santa Fe.

Night Life

Michelangelo, 433 Balcarce (331-5392), a small nightclub in a former convent, offers a good dinner before the 9:30 show, which consists of couples dancing tangos from different eras, a small band and singers. Dinner plus the show costs $50; the show alone is $30.

The tango can also be heard at the Viejo Almacén, 799 Balcarce (362-3923), and at Casa Blanca, 668 Balcarce (334-5010), which features folk dancing with boleadoras and Andean pipe music as well. Nightly shows, $35, with open bar. ■

LETTERS ON TRAVEL

Phone Fraud

To the Editor: The Practical Traveler column about thieves who steal credit card numbers (March 28) was a timely one for our family. Two days earlier our telephone bill had arrived and included $1,100 in international calls not made by us. In discussing the bill that evening with New York Telephone and A.T.&T., we came up with the following scenario:

A family member about to leave Pennsylvania Station for Washington placed a call to a friend. Three minutes later, according to the bill, a call was made from another pay phone at Penn Station, by an unknown party, to a number in another borough. Eight minutes later, the overseas calls began, from five numbers in yet another borough, all at one address, according to the phone company. The calls continued for 20 hours — 85 calls to seven countries.

Another family member trying to call home the next day was informed that our personal identification number was no longer valid. Apparently, unusual activity on a calling card triggers a mechanism that cancels the card.

Who will pay this bill? The long-distance carrier is sorting it out and will contact us. To reinforce the warning in the article, let callers in public places beware: There may indeed be someone looking over your shoulder, perhaps even with binoculars.

Prague to Warsaw

To the Editor: Our unhappy experience in December on the overnight train Silesia from Prague to Warsaw is worth sharing, and we'd like to warn others.

We used the Eurailpass for senior citizens, and on weeknights we usually had a first-class compartment to ourselves for overnight trips. The seat cushions can be pulled forward and the seatbacks slide down, leaving no room for anyone to walk inside the compartment.

Aboard the Silesia, our sleep was interrupted once when we had to show our rail passes, and a second time for passport checks. After we were again asleep, three men in uniforms rudely awakened us, indicating that it was forbidden for us to sleep. They made us put the seats back up and gestured that we must remain sitting up, saying something about "hooligans." Also, one of them beckoned me to follow him several cars to one equipped with couchettes. This was sort of a dormitory, where people were sleeping on bunks, with an attendant watching over them. For $50 each, we were offered places in here. It was already around 3 A.M., and I couldn't see the advantage. I went back to our first-class compartment, for which we had already paid, including a supplement because the pass does not cover travel inside Poland beyond the German border.

To stay awake, I changed the battery in my camcorder and rearranged my photo and sound recording equipment, vaguely aware that someone in the corridor was watching. We soon dozed off, and awoke as the train pulled into the Warsaw Central Station, only to discover that our bag of equipment and traveler's checks were gone.

The conductor and stationmaster responded with shrugged shoulders and gestures of helplessness. When we mentioned the word police, they both made negative gestures. Across the street at a Holiday Inn, the desk clerk's first bit of advice was: "Don't go to the police, because they will take your passports and hold them while they conduct their investigation." Also, we were told, it was very unlikely that we would ever again see the missing items. We left for Budapest that afternoon by plane.

Could the robbery have taken place if we had kept the seats stretched out and the compartment door locked? That wasn't allowed. The moral is: Stay overnight in hotels. In this region, extra care is a must.

South America

To the Editor: As I hastened to leave my room at the Capilla del Mar Hotel in Cartagena, Colombia, to fly to Guayaquil, Ecuador, I left my underarm money pouch containing $3,990, plus tickets from Guayaquil to Lima, Peru; Santo Domingo, Dominican Republic; Kingston, Jamaica, and back to Kennedy in New York. I realized the error just before landing in Guayaquil.

I called the hotel and found that my pouch, with money and tickets intact, had been turned in by the maid. Jenny Garcia, the field supervisor, and Cynthia Martinez, the station agent for Continental Airlines in Guayaquil, arranged for the Capilla del Mar to advance me $700 through Continental's agents in Quito, to be carried overnight by messenger to the airline in Guayaquil, so I could fly back to Cartagena to recover my belongings. (Money cannot be forwarded out of Colombia by courier service, and I had only $100 in my pocket.)

When I returned to Cartagena four days later (the soonest possible flight), the money and tickets were waiting for me. You can be sure I talked to the maid and gave her a reward. I have traveled in over 125 countries, usually alone, and I am convinced that people are universally concerned, helpful and caring. I am writing this letter to counteract some of the horror stories we hear so often.

Alhambra Tickets

To the Editor: I would like to tell about a rule at the Alhambra in Granada, Spain.

When you get your entrance ticket, you have exactly 30 minutes to enter the main Alcazar and Palacio Real building. My family and I, as well as three or four other groups we met that day, were not informed of this when we purchased our tickets, and instead first visited the older Alcazaba and the Généralife gardens at our leisure. When we tried to enter the Alcazar 20 minutes after our 30-minute allowance had expired, we were forced to buy new tickets.

Admittedly, the administration does post this rule, but only in two languages, and not very visibly. For those of us in this predicament, it was an unpleasant memory of the Alhambra.

BARBARA M. WRIGHT
Pittsburgh

Rocio Liñán, a spokeswoman for the Alhambra, responds: Signs about the new system of timing visits, which went into effect Dec. 21, are posted in Spanish and English in the ticket offices of Alhambra and Généralife, on the bridge that joins the two and every entrance gate.

Battling the Swirls of the Yellowstone

From mountains to prairie on a haul by kayak through Montana's Paradise Valley

George Wuerthner

Maria Inés Salgado

By STEVE CHAPPLE

I BEACHED the kayak and took my lunch at the head of the rapids, which proved to be a mistake. As the rough current swirled away in front of me, fear had a chance to build in my mind.

At this bend of the Yellowstone River in Montana's Paradise Valley, the water drops two or three feet off a gravel bar, gathers speed, and slams into a wall of granite boulders. To shoot these rapids in my touring kayak without dumping, I thought at first I would have to keep to the main current where haystacks, or billows of white water, would wash over the boat, and me. Then I would have to negotiate a very hard and immediate left turn. If I did not swing left in time, there was a chance I would be turned sideways to the flow, capsize, and be washed upside down under the boulders.

As I sat in the beached boat, half on shore, half in the water, I looked from the river to the mountains. The tall cottonwoods shivered lima green beside the river. The canyons ribbing the foothills were dark with spruce and shadows. Higher, on the north slope of Emigrant Peak, which, at almost 11,000 feet, dominates Paradise Valley like some shock of rock in the Himalayas, the aspens were turning that contradictory shade of pale chartreuse that is so hard to get right even in good paintings.

I had chosen this gravel bar of an island for lunch because, as I approached, two great blue herons had floated down from the trees to a side channel, and I wanted to stalk them up close. There was also supposed to be a heron rookery somewhere on this run.

But by the time I had beached the kayak and stripped off the top of my wet suit in the dry 80-degree heat, the herons had disappeared. In the side channel, paddling in their place, were five mergansers. As I set out some Danish cheese, sourdough bread and half a bottle of wine, I kept my eye out for deer. The brushy cover looked good but it was too bright, too early in the day for deer.

Americans have always had a love affair with their rivers. Think of Mark Twain and the Mississippi or Henry David Thoreau and the Merrimack. The Yellowstone, perhaps more beautiful than either, at least these days, is one of the last major free-flowing rivers in the continental United States. The vista of the Colorado is obscured by smog from Los Angeles, the Columbia can no longer sustain salmon and the Sacramento has long been dammed, but the Yellowstone flows virtually unspoiled for its entire length. It begins in an icy trickle high in the mountains of Yellowstone National Park and runs, winds, and sings through canyon and prairie to the Missouri River, roughly 600 miles to the north and east.

The Yellowstone River is also the soul of Montana, a state that increasingly has come to symbolize the new American West. The country singer Merle Haggard rasps: "Turn me loose, set me free / Somewhere in the middle of Montana." Robert Redford, in the movie "A River Runs Through It," searches for simple truths in this last great place.

On my gravel bar in Paradise last summer, the simple truth was that lunch was over, and the river needed to be confronted. I zipped up my wet suit and tugged on the spray skirt, which is a confining girdle fitted first over the stomach and then onto the cockpit. The skirt forms a rubber seal between river and body, so that, when the invigorating haystacks crash into one's face, the kayak — unlike a canoe — does not fill with water.

I had rented this blue polyethylene plastic Aquaterra Chinook touring kayak the week before, and it was only the second kayak I had ever been in. As a descendant of Montana pioneers, however, I liked to think I possessed that Western sense of optimism that dictates that when challenged to do some-

MONTANA has at least a half-dozen regional personalities, by my family's count. Our first impression of the state — where we have vacationed for the last five summers — was of the wildlife-refuge-turned-theme park of Yellowstone. Nearby was the sprightly and trendy Montana of Bozeman and the Paradise Valley, with a generous supply of B and B's, coffeehouses and movie stars.

We found the emptiest Montana in the broiling badlands of the east, where dinosaur bones far outnumber tourists. And our favorite Montana is the majestic and never-tamed Glacier National Park, particularly the six-mile hike to Iceberg Lake.

But families, at least mine, are not always in the mood for high drama and rugged adventure. It was en route to Glacier, but not yet in the wilderness spirit, that we stumbled on the Flathead Lake region of eastern Montana, one of the few quiet surprises in this spectacular state.

Many tourists make the drive to Glacier from Missoula, 150 miles to the south, as we did, or from one of Montana's three big B's farther south and west (Butte, Bozeman and Billings), often passing through Flathead country. Flathead Lake's existence cannot be entirely a surprise to travelers, for it is the biggest patch of blue on state road maps. At 30 miles by up to 15 miles, it is, in fact, the largest freshwater lake west of the Mississippi. And it presents an azure panorama from U.S. 93 as one heads north from Missoula.

DON LESSEM is co-author of "The Complete T. Rex," featuring the discovery of dinosaur remains in Montana, which Simon & Schuster is publishing this month.

The majestic lake sits in the middle of a glacial valley, flanked east and west by the Mission Range mountains, the peaks of which are treeless at 9,000 feet elevation, and snow-capped the year round. Just to the east is the 1.5 million-acre Bob Marshall Wilderness, the wildest of Montana's 20 million acres of forest and wilderness. Long before you see the lake, you are in Flathead country, an enormous realm, most of which (1,245,600 acres) belongs to the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes.

The tribes have long been known for their hospitality. They made peace with white settlers, the first of whom, David Thompson, arrived in 1808, and defended them against the Blackfeet. When whites changed the treaty agreements, opening the area to extensive homesteading, the tribes did not resort to violence. Today they are 3,000 strong and renowned for their stewardship of wildlife. The Mission Mountain Tribal Wilderness, west of the Mission Range, is the first Indian-sponsored wildlife refuge in the country.

On the lake's southwestern shore is Polson, a town of 3,800 that is a decidedly unattractive place — at once built up and rundown in a manner reminiscent of how man's worst constructions and nature's best are so often found side by side in Alaska. Aside from the somewhat precious arts community of Bigfork on the Swan River, near the lake's northern shore, these are the only towns of any size by Flathead Lake. There are plenty of fast-food joints, cabins and motels in Polson, but only one stop attracted us, the Best Western Kwataqnuk Lodge.

The lodge, a handsome and spacious new hotel along the water's edge, is owned and largely staffed by members of the Salish and Kootenai tribes. It was designed to double as a casino, but Montana legislators have lately

Montana's Cow Town With Charm

Bozeman, in its spectacular setting, doesn't want to become too popular

Friday night entertainment at the Leaf and Bean Coffee House.

PERHAPS the best thing a tourist can do to insure a good time in Bozeman, Mont., is to stop at the airport on the way into town and rent a car with Montana license plates. Bozeman suffers from municipal schizophrenia. They want tourists, but not too many.

Montana State University is in Bozeman and supplies an army of earringed, baggy-sweatshirted youths who do their best to make visitors feel like Dow Chemical interviewers on the Berkeley campus in 1968. From the old-time cafes and bars of Main Street, grizzled old ranchers stare skeptically from under cowboy hats at anything that doesn't smell at least vaguely of cow. Even the businessmen and businesswomen, the old guard and the proprietors of the new upscale restaurants and gift shops may quiz you about how long you plan to stay. Yet Bozeman's economy turns on the tourist buck.

The people of Bozeman may have some disagreements among themselves — graffiti on a grain elevator reads, "Stop subsidized farming," and some cowboys are fond of threatening the nature-loving college students, known here as granolas, with physical harm — but they agree on one thing: outsiders are not to be trusted. Of course you don't have to go back too far to find that they were all, at one time, outsiders themselves. What they are trying to do is protect their little city (population 22,660)), and the mountain valley that surrounds it, from the corrupting forces of the rest of the world.

If you're going to Bozeman, try to blend in. No Gucci loafers. Patagonia fleece and New Balance hiking boots are acceptable. Cowboy boots and Levis are even better, if they are suitably besmudged. But it's your mode of transport that will give you away faster than anything. A Bozeman (my own name for the residents) can spot New Jersey plates a quarter-mile away. He or she can sense the presence of a Los Angeles Range Rover when it tops the Continental Divide 90 miles south. Winnebagos should definitely be checked at the airport. Rent that nondescript car. A pickup truck would be even better, especially if it has no lightning bolt decals and is carrying enough dust.

Why go to such lengths to gain entrance to a city that can't decide if it wants you or not? There are some darn good reasons, and almost all of them relate in one way or another to the truly breathtaking scenery that surrounds the city.

Glance in any direction from Bozeman and you see mountains to rival the Alps or the Andes. The Big Belt Mountains and the Madison range act like a gigantic funnel that concentrates water into the Gallatin River Valley, where Bozeman is situated. The water winds on downstream to the Three Forks basin, where the Missouri River begins. The mountains mean wildlife, fresh air and outdoor sports; the water means rivers and some of the best fishing in the world. It all adds up to a fertile valley where agriculture thrives, and to an outdoor paradise second to none.

Yellowstone National Park is only 60 miles south, up the Gallatin Canyon. It is one of the prettiest drives in the country. Fishermen, kayakers, hikers and mountain bikers haunt the national forests that surround Bozeman, including the vast Gallatin National Forest. There is a lot of high-tech outdoor activity in the wild places surrounding the Gallatin Valley, and Bozeman is the center of it all. Despite the natural tendency of those who know the country to protect it from overuse, the city has adjusted to the new demands made of it without going to the extremes of Aspen or Santa Fe, at least so far.

Downtown has wide streets lined with mostly three- and four-story brick buildings, and the residential areas have shady avenues with well-kept Midwestern-style homes that date from the early part of this century. The nucleus of town is not very different from what it was in the days when the West was really wild.

Bozeman does not depend completely on outside money to function. There is Montana State University, and there is a proud, healthy livestock and small grain component of the community that gives the city a unique and colorful character. In many ways, Bozeman is a place where the Old West meets the New West and the local economy meets the world economy. It's a place where solid old saddle horses encounter titanium mountain bikes.

A good time to observe this phenomenon is the middle of June, when Bozeman plays host to the College National Finals Rodeo. There is dancing and beer drinking and bareback horse and bull riding. The city and half of the state of Montana seems to turn out in boots and cowboy hats to kick off the week with a parade down the historic Main Street. They parade right past a half dozen exposed-beam, alfalfa-sprout restaurants that would be just as much at home in Santa Barbara. The legions of mounted college cowboys troop past the coffeehouse owned by Glenn Close and her sister Jessie (a writer who lives in Bozeman), where you can get a great cappuccino or listen to live jazz on the weekends. They pass a couple of bookstores that New York might be proud of. The parade winds past Wilson Auditorium, where two months before the rock group Taj Mahal entertained some of the same folks who are on the horses. There's an active time warp in Bozeman, Mont.

ANOTHER way to explore the meeting of the old West with the new is to consider the menus of Bozeman's restaurants. Contrast breakfast at one of the old cafes (chicken-fried steak, pan-fried potatoes, two eggs, toast, coffee and lots of cream gravy for $4.59) to lunch at a new restaurant just a block down the street (beef and venison tenderloin stir-fried in oriental ginger and oyster sauce with garlic and basil served over rice sticks for $14.95).

The old meeting the new can be seen in two of Bozeman's museums. The Gallatin County Pioneer Museum is housed in the old jail and sports a "gallows room" where the local desperado Seth Danner met his fate in 1924. There are other displays on pioneer life, the cattle boom and the United States Cavalry. Bozeman's founder, John Bozeman, for whom the Bozeman Trail was named, rates a whole wall and glass case of mementos. (The town grew at the end of his trail in 1864 as a supply center for Western gold fields.) It's a great little homespun museum, likely to be enjoyed by any history buff. Dennis Seibel gave up business and engineering careers to become the museum's first director. He speaks with passion about Bozeman's past.

But if your interest in history tends toward the modern, try the American Computer Museum. As improbable as it sounds, Bozeman is the home of one of the nation's two computer museums. You wouldn't think the evolution of the computer could be nearly as interesting as the mechanics of the trapdoor that held Seth Danner aloft (temporarily), but, in a very different way, it is. The curators, Barbara and George Keremedjiev, are clearly as much in love with computers as Mr. Seibel is with local history. The Keremedjievs have brought together in the two-room museum rare specimens of just about every stage of computer existence. Their excitement is contagious. You may be surprised to find yourself hanging on every word as they take you through their idea of history, from abacus to microchip.

For the ultimate in old-meets-new museum experiences, there's the Museum of the Rockies, connected to Montana State University. The museum is dedicated to the history of the Rocky Mountains from recent times, back through the American Indian tenure and to the reign of dinosaurs. It's an active museum with beautiful displays, traveling exhibits and crews of people, both out in the field and in workrooms cleaning up such specimens as a Montana Tyrannosaurus rex.

Inside the Museum of the Rockies is the Taylor Planetarium, which puts you center stage in Montana's oldest spectacle, the "big sky." But even the stars have been brought into the present with weekend planetarium shows set to the music of Led Zeppelin or Pink Floyd. The shows' popularity with the M.S.U. students is immense, and it's not uncommon to see a cowboy hat silhouetted thing tough or stupid — clear 160 acres, withstand a minus-20-degree Livingston winter, or hit the rapids at hand — the true Montanan jumps in with a painted smile on his face and paddles.

Maybe I should not have drunk the wine. But I lifted my paddle to the sky and talked out loud to the mountains. In the full sunshine came an epiphany. All I had to do was shove into the current and angle ingloriously over the gravel bar to the extreme left. For some reason, I had not noticed this alternative route before lunch. Over on the far left bank, I might have to scoot back and forth like a salamander caught in the mud, until the boat reached floatable water, but by doing so I would avoid the main rapids.

I paddled hard for the left bank. Rocks scraped the bottom of the kayak. The stern listed. Then the boat was free, clear of the gravel ledge. In a minute I was downriver and safe, enjoying once more that wonderful feeling of float.

Killdeer called from the bank. A ruffed grouse, perhaps lost, bobbed over the open sky of the river. I caught sight of an osprey, or fish eagle, eating a trout in the shallows. I was lucky, I thought, to see an eagle at all. It was the first one of the trip. I saw another one. Then I heard the rushing of another close rapids. This time I made sure to point the bow into the current and keep paddling.

For the next few miles, the Yellowstone was smooth enough. The current was strong, and the eddies took off helter-skelter, twirling toward the bank like square dancers wearing full petticoats, but nothing too fearful presented itself. My mind wandered to the birds, and I scanned the tops of the trees. I was still searching for that heron rookery.

A little above Carter's Bridge, I saw it. The round twig nests glued into the topmost branches of the cottonwoods stood out like basketballs that had been tossed up, never to come down. The rookery was peaceful when I floated by, and so was I — done, I thought, with rapids for the day. But soon after the rookery, a real bow-thumper appeared, almost within sight of Carter's Bridge. Afterward, I would christen the run "Front-of-the-Boat Rapids," since the white water flying into my face at this bend caused me to scrunch forward in the boat and hope for deliverance. The haystacks were all over me, but I managed to stabilize the boat by hunching over the bow and cutting through them.

That day in the Paradise Valley, I was on the first leg of a long journey down the length of the Yellowstone, with my wife, Maria Inês Salgado, and our two boys, Cody, 3, and Jack, 1. The boys were a little young for kayaking, but some days we would all jump into a self-bailing raft from Northwest River Supply, and at night we camped or stayed in motels together. The Paradise is a 34-mile scoop of prairie and alfalfa fields flanked on the west by the Gallatins and on the east by the granite wall of the Absaroka Range. The valley is guarded at the north by the cowboy literary town of Livingston and at the south by Yankee Jim Canyon. Yankee Jim is a dangerous run of white water and swirling holes, the deepest section of the river. The Yellowstone through Paradise is mostly flat, although, as I had discovered, even where flat the river is always big water, deceptively powerful and full of tricky rapids.

At Livingston, it doglegs east, forming what in the 19th century was called the Great Bend. This middle Yellowstone skirts the edge of the Absarokas and the Beartooth Mountains. On the north run sandstone cliffs, pockmarked with holes where rock doves roost, and above which more eagles soar. The terrain becomes arid along the middle Yellowstone. The water turns from mountain blue to jade green.

HERE I often thought of William Clark, who, separated from Meriwether Lewis in the summer of 1806, began his long slide home, down the Yellowstone, to the Missouri, to the Mississippi, to report eventually to Thomas Jefferson concerning the Louisiana Purchase. Clark was unable to find cottonwoods large enough to fashion canoes until about Billings, near a tributary the Indians then called "The Lodge Where All Dance" but is now more prosaically named Clark's Fork.

At Billings, the biggest little city in Montana, the Yellowstone snakes beneath the smokestack of the Montana Power Company's coal-fired plant and skirts the edges of several oil refinery tank farms. I was surprised, this close to civilization, to see three white-tailed deer on the bank.

After Billings, the river returns to its solitary course. It becomes a prairie river. Stratas of coal stripe the yellow bluffs. The water browns with mud from the tributaries of the Rosebud, the Big Horn, the Powder, and the Tongue. A little more than a century ago, these tributaries were the locations for many battles between the United States Cavalry and Sioux and Cheyenne warriors.

In its own meandering way, the lower Yellowstone is as spectacular as the fast mountain river upstream. Beyond Miles City, where the original lonesome dove, the Texas cattleman Gus McCrae, once held forth in the Olive Hotel, flocks of geese, as many as 100 at a time, honked in raucous alarm whenever I paddled by. Most river bends held a gangly blue heron or two. Dozens of pelicans, incongruous so far from any coast, policed the shallow for minnows. Every so often a bald or golden eagle swooped to the top of a lightning-struck cottonwood. On the lower Yellowstone, birds became my companions, guides and talismans.

The prairie Yellowstone braids into channels as it flows around islands covered with majestic stands of cottonwoods. These bushy, bearded tree monsters are the aspens of the bottom land. By the time I reached the lower Yellowstone — some weeks after setting out from the national park — the cottonwoods were turning from green to yellow to russet. If you compared them to their mountain cousins, the aspens, you might imagine aspens as minimalist brush strokes, and cottonwoods as wild blotches of color run amok in willy-nilly gnarliness.

For 300 miles I had been falling in love with birds. Now I found myself rhapsodizing about trees. Cottonwoods provided the only living color on the lower Yellowstone, save the blue feathers of the herons, and a few rouge-painted cliffs.

Barren, the prairie river was still a magical place. I met people here who loved its desolation and felt cramped by the lush and green mountains upriver. After days of paddling through the badlands of eastern Montana, I came to believe that to live here, it might help to be a little crazy of mind and a lot pure of soul. In this landscape in times past, some men had fallen in love with the wolves they had killed. Some women went mad in sod huts, and others flowered, like Evelyn Cameron, the British photographer who started the Eve Ranch near Terry a hundred years ago. Cameron preferred hard Montana living to the privileges of her English upbringing.

Today, Montana and the Yellowstone are changing. In the east, cattle ranchers are being challenged by environmentalists who would like to see the return of the buffalo. In the Paradise Valley, kayakers and windsurfers are as likely to be seen as trout fishermen in drift boats. Some old Montanans scratch their heads at these new sports people, who spend serious money to fly in from New York or Los Angeles. But year after year, the valley is being turned into a rougher version of Ketchum, Idaho, or Aspen, Colo.

I knew I was part of the changes, a naïve Montanan paddling the length of the river in a new blue kayak. I knew that what would remain the same was the river itself, joining mountain to prairie. It was the watery soul of the last best place. ■

Choices in lodging, meals and equipment

Getting There

Livingston, at the foot of the Paradise Valley, is 21 miles from Bozeman and 118 miles from Billings. Both cities are served by Delta, Continental and Northwest Airlines.

Accommodations

Chico Hot Springs Lodge, in Pray in the valley, (406) 333-4933, is at the base of the notch between Emigrant Peak and Chico Peak. Best described as cowboy Victorian, it was built in 1900 and remodeled extensively in the 1970's. I spent evenings after fishing and kayaking soaking sore muscles in Chico's hot pools, with my family. On weekends, country music is played. Baby sitters are sometimes available, and our toddler spent his mornings riding a Shetland pony. Room rates for two are $64, rising to $66 from May 28. (All rates are for double room with private bath.) Entrees in the restaurant average $18.95.

Accommodations in Livingston are cheaper than in the valley. On the southern edge of town, the Yellowstone Motor Inn, Park Road, (406) 222-6110, has an indoor pool. A double room is $60. The newly refurbished Murray Hotel and Lounge, 201 West Park, (406) 222-1350, charges $39 for two; the summer rate from June 1 will be about $50. At the Guest House Motel, 105 West Park, (406) 222-1460, the rate is $32, rising to $38 in June.

Eating

The food in Montana has improved over the last two or three decades, but it may always be wise to order beef in some form. Lamb often comes from New Zealand, and there is very little indigenous seafood. Most restaurants will cook the trout you caught yourself.

In Livingston, the Livingston Bar and Grill, 130 North Main, (406) 222-7909, and The Sport, 114 South Main, (406) 222-3533, add a couple of dollars a person to the bill for cooking a visitor's catch. The Livingston's own entrees start at $9.25 and go on up to $40 for twin lobster tails. At The Sport — which has a stuffed leopard above the cash register — the range is from $4.25 to $13.50 for rib steak.

The Owl Lounge, 110 North Second, (406) 222-1322, serves as local literary outpost.

Outdoor Gear

Kayaks and rafts may be rented from Northern Lights Trading Company, 1716 West Babcock, Bozeman, Mont. 59715, (406) 586-2229, which also sells tents, clothing and mountain-climbing equipment. A touring kayak, complete with spray skirt, wet suit and paddle, rents for about $85 a week.

From as little as $3,260* including airfare from New York, you could be on board for the historic European inaugural sailings of the ms Statendam and all the excitement of Northern Europe. She sails for 13 days to the treasures of the Baltic. To Oslo, Stockholm, Helsinki and Copenhagen, the great coastal cities of the midnight sun. To Russia's St. Petersburg. And then on, via land, to bustling Berlin. Of course, with so much included, cruising Europe is always a terrific value compared to a land package. But with savings like these, it's all the more so.

She Has A Huge Following, But Don't Worry. She's Making Several Trips.

Song of America is beginning a first and long-awaited season of Bermuda cruises. And since her popularity can only be rivaled by the islands themselves, we anticipate an early and quite eager response.

Fortunately, with sailings from New York every Sunday, your calendar should allow many opportunities to indulge. And indulge you will, with the service, appointments and dining that earned Song of America her Ship of the Year award three times.†

After having experienced her charms, you'll be well prepared for those of Bermuda's. Pink sands, international shopping that's almost mythic, and the regal British influence of St. George's and Hamilton.

7-Night Bermuda From $795* Song of America Cruise Only

Unfortunately, there are only so many Sundays through October. So it would be wise to call us for reservations immediately. (Once on board, you can forget all about such pressing responsibilities.)

Bozeman's Charms

Photographs by Rob Outlaw for The New York Times

The Spanish Peaks, overlooking the Gallatin Valley in Bozeman.

over a planetarium seat on a Saturday night.

But if you go to Bozeman, it will probably be for the out-of-doors. In the winter, Bozeman is the hub for two ski hills and hundreds of miles of cross-country ski trails. The Big Sky ski area is 45 miles south of town, and Bridger Bowl is 16 miles northeast. Both have long runs, lots of vertical rise and about 400 inches of annual snowfall. If you're there in the summer, try an outdoor Indian powwow or one of Bozeman's six golf courses. For the adventurous, there is rafting on one of southwestern Montana's many scenic rivers.

These rivers are known best for their trout production. The Bozeman area supports some of the world's finest cold-water fisheries. It's known for its fly fishing, and it is not coincidental that the movie "A River Runs Through It" was filmed here.

Mary Jane DiSanti, owner of the Country Bookshelf.

In fact, the Bozeman area is known in Hollywood for more than its movie locations. It's fast becoming very chic to have a summer home within driving distance of the Bozeman airport. Ted Turner and Jane Fonda own the 130,000-acre Flying D ranch just up the canyon. Meg Ryan and Dennis Quaid have a ranch over the hill. Tom Brokaw and the novelist Thomas McGuane also have homes up there somewhere.

A mass of lesser-knowns have bought up lots along every watershed, and houses are springing up where a lot of people don't like to see houses, like on the bank of your old fishing hole or the place you first went parking with your spouse. If you are sensitive, you can detect an incipient rush hour during the summer months. There are a lot of fast-food joints for the folks who come to visit or have adopted Bozeman. And like just about every American city, Bozeman has its tacky neon strips.

It's this sprawl of development that tends to make the natives restless. The problem is that they can't tell tourists from people who are looking for a great place to live. That's the real reason your car with Connecticut plates may draw icy stares.

An alternative to renting that car with local plates might be to put a sign on the side of your car saying that you are a tourist and that you plan to go home soon. You might add that you like the place you live and wouldn't exchange it for any place on earth. But be advised that, after a trip to Bozeman, you might have to reconsider. ■

B. Wednesday.
C. Friday.
D. Sunday.

3 What's the fastest way to get around Washington, D.C.?

5 In most cases, what does a travel agent charge to plan and book your trip?

A. 10 percent of the cost.
B. $10 per transaction.
C. It varies by overall cost.
D. Not one red cent.

If you couldn't pass this quiz without help from a travel agent, allow us to offer you one tiny suggestion: don't take a trip without help from a travel agent.

ISTANBUL

Make a point of it. With Turkish Airlines.

For centuries, Istanbul was the centre of ancient civilisation. And today it's easy to see why. Although much has changed, Istanbul is still very central when travelling to the Middle East or to Asia. And quite possibly very central to the enjoyment of your trip as well.

Especially on Turkish Airlines. You'll have the comfort of our modern fleet of planes which offer you extra leg room and wide Business Class seating.

Add to this our warm Turkish hospitality, and you just may find yourself thinking we're an important centre of modern civilisation too.

Playing the Blues in West Virginia

For music lovers at a campus festival, the best way to learn is just to join in

By JOHN MILWARD

EACH week at the annual Augusta Heritage Arts Workshops is different. Last summer, Blues Week went into orbit in the wee hours of Tuesday night. Earlier in the evening, the faculty had given a concert for the back-porch musicians who'd come to Elkins, W.Va., to immerse themselves in music lessons and impromptu jam sessions. Now, in the Ice House, the funky beer hall that is the center of nocturnal activity on the campus of Davis and Elkins College, Gaye Adegbalola was leading a rowdy choir through a tune called "Meet Me With Your Black Drawers On." With a point of her finger, Ms. Adegbalola, a vocal instructor who spends the rest of her year performing with the group Saffire, would direct an individual to improvise a verse to the bawdy blues. The boisterous assembly did not have to be encouraged to join in on the chorus.

Outside, on the porch of Halliehurst, a palatial mansion that recently celebrated its centennial, members of Group du Jour, a zydeco band from Minneapolis, formed the core of a late-night jam session that mixed country blues with rollicking Cajun music. A few dozen observers, some of them dancing on Halliehurst's wide wooden porch, enjoyed moments of music that were deserving of a big-city cover charge and a two-drink minimum. Yet played under stars spread across a mountain sky, the music seemed enriched by the fact that it was created not for fame, but for fun.

JOHN MILWARD writes about the arts for a variety of publications.

The Augusta Heritage Arts Workshops, entering its 21st season, is an arts and crafts camp for adults. Held on this hilly campus at the edge of the Monongahela National Forest in the mountains of central West Virginia, it invites grown-ups to suspend everyday concerns and focus on such questions as how to spice up the bass line in a country blues tune, how to play in a combo without stepping all over the other instrumentalists and how to fashion cafeteria offerings into a palatable meal.

Augusta is about more than the blues; over a five-week summer season, extensive programs are also offered in Cajun, swing, bluegrass, Irish and old-time musical styles. Among the instruments taught in various classes, which range from beginner to advanced, are the accordion, autoharp, banjo, Dobro (a kind of lap guitar usually played with a slide), dulcimer, fiddle, guitar, harmonica, mandolin, piano, tin whistle and the uillean pipes (an Irish variation on the bagpipe).

The Augusta Heritage Center, whose stated purpose is to preserve the region's traditional art forms, also offers workshops in everything from basket making to stained glass and from stonemasonry to log house construction. There is also a full menu of dance classes, as well as Elderhostel programs designed for participants over the age of 60.

A week at Augusta is indelibly colored by the particular passions that lure you to these scenic mountains of West Virginia. On my arrival at Blues Week, I figured that, with my intermediate skills, I just might have the nerve to play guitar in a late-night jam session. Five days later, my heart beating like a big bass drum, I made my public singing debut at the student talent show, performing "Dust My Room," an Augusta-inspired rewrite of the classic Elmore James song, "Dust My Broom":

Gonna get up in the morning, believe I'll dust my room.
Gonna get up in the morning, believe I'll dust my room.
This dorm that I been living in, man it feels just like a tomb.

Most Augusta visitors share a double room in one of the cinderblock dormitories that are home to the students of the college. (Friends and couples can arrange to be booked into the same room; otherwise, the same-sex assignments are random.) The Spartan accommodations with bathrooms down the hall are sure to feel familiar to anybody who's been to college over the past 40 years. The good news is that you're here for a week, not a year, and that by the end of a long day, you'll hardly notice that the bed springs sag like a hammock.

I'm gonna get myself off campus, gonna find myself a steak.
I'm gonna get myself off campus, gonna find myself a steak.
The food that I've been eating, it ain't hardly fit for a snake.

If the dorm doesn't conjure up undergraduate memories, picking up a tray in the cafeteria does the trick. Except for the occasionally savory main course, the soundest strategy is to take advantage of the sidebar offerings, such as the excellent salad bar, the luncheon sandwich board and an assortment of fresh fruit. A do-it-yourself waffle iron provided my own favorite breakfast. Perhaps the biggest surprise about cafeteria cuisine is that for adults used to fending for themselves, a meal plan can almost feel like a luxury. It's not fine dining, but it sure is simple.

Although there are off-campus options for eating and sleeping, most opt for the economical dorm-and-board combination; the 1993 rate is $175 for a week that runs from Sunday dinner to Saturday breakfast. Tuition for most programs is $245. The significant advantage of on-campus living is easy access to a busy schedule of classes and evening activities that include concerts, dances and spontaneous musical sessions around the Ice House.

I got here Sunday morning, blue skies above my head.
I got here Sunday morning, blue skies above my head.
Four days later, man I'd be better off dead.

Augusta can be an exhausting experience — by week's end, the die-hards walk around in a glassy-eyed stupor, resigned to minimal rest until they return home. Classes are organized differently for various pursuits. Blues Week divides the day into four periods of about an hour each to give students access to a wide variety of styles and teachers. During a Sunday evening orientation meeting, each instructor describes what he or she hopes to accomplish in the class. Students

Books Away From Home

In 160 world cities, the U.S.I.A. offers American publications

By GEORGE STOLZ

Robert Royal for The New York Times

The library Centro Washington Irving in Madrid.

WHEN we travel we often leave behind more than our homes, offices and routines; we also leave behind most of our books, newspapers and magazines.

English-speaking travelers abroad can fill the information gap at the network of predominantly English-language lending and research libraries operated by the United States Information Agency in 160 cities around the world. The libraries are open free to the public, except in about 15 cities where they serve a more specialized function. They contain books, newspapers, magazines, government bulletins, on-line database searches and videocassettes, all originating in the United States. Lending policies vary, but generally tourists passing through cannot take out books unless they get a co-signature from the a resident of the host country.

Designed to inform residents of the host countries about United States society, culture and government, the libraries' catalogues span a wide range of categories. Current fiction, political studies, poetry anthologies and art books are all found in the libraries, as are reference books, sports and business magazines, scholarly journals and newspapers. The single criterion for the material is that it somehow reflect an image of and provide information about the United States, although emphasis is placed on the social sciences, international relations, the arts and the humanities.

The Library Program began in 1942 when the State Department, in collaboration with the American Library Association, opened the Benjamin Franklin Library in Mexico City as a means of providing a research center for local students of United States affairs. A handful of similar jointly operated libraries followed in the wartime years.

But once the war was over, the libraries took on a new mission: to inform the world about the Americans who were directing recovery efforts. Operating under military jurisdiction, libraries were opened in big cities throughout Europe and Asia, with special emphasis placed on the libraries in Japan and Germany, according to Dr. Barry Fulton, the acting associate director of U.S.I.A. for Educational and Cultural Affairs in Washington. When the agency was established in 1953, the library program became part of its United States information service division.

Today the library program is used by nearly six million people annually and contains about 1.3 million books, 21,000 periodicals and a online database.

The typical branch contains 10,000 books and is supervised by librarians from the host countries who have received their library science training in the United States, often with the agency in Washington.

Although a tenet of the program has been that the libraries remain open to the general public, today they serve primarily as research centers for political leaders, journalists and students in the host countries, especially in industrialized countries. The libraries provide information about the United States that otherwise would be difficult, if not impossible, to obtain, often because of prohibitive costs or political difficulties.

"Open stacks, open access — that's really the model the libraries took on as we developed," said Dr. Fulton. "We try to provide an up-to-date picture of the U.S. that is nonpolitical and apolemical."

The largest library in the program is the New Delhi branch, which has more than 27,000 books and 200 periodicals, while the Cairo library lists more than 15,000 books and 200 periodicals. Some of the program's farther-flung libraries (depending, of course, on one's perspective) operate in Katmandu, Ankara, Jakarta, Kuala Lumpur, Cebu, Zagreb, Rangoon, Quito, Lusaka, Harare and Kinshasa.

In recent months, libraries have been opened in Bratislava, Slovakia; Tirana, Albania, and Kiev, Ukraine. Within the next year there are plans to open branches in Minsk, Belarus; Tbilisi, Georgia; Riga, Latvia; Vilnius, Lithuania, and Tallinn, Estonia.

One of the oldest libraries is the Washington Irving Center in Madrid. It opened with a private donation of 200 books in 1942 and has grown today into a full-scale research center, containing 10,000 books (4,000 of which circulate) and 130 periodicals and employing five local employees, four of them librarians, according to Kath-
